Let the children have plenty of sleep. I have seen young children—almost infants—waked and made to get up two hours before their natural sleep was finished, merely because it was thought best that they should "eat breakfast with the other people." Imagine yourself in the hands of a giant, and being hauled out of bed in the midst of profound and refreshing slumber, just for the pleasure of eating breakfast with a lot of other giants, who grin at you if you are cross, and perhaps vigorously spank you—some one of them—if you say or do anything expressive of your wretched feelings. There are no healthy children who take more sleep than they need, and yet we often see young boys "routed" before sunrise and set to work, with empty stomach and dizzy heads, at chores that might just as well await the coming of a decent hour. Let us all pray to be preserved from that slashing, mule-headed, and often ignorant farmer, who "drives" everything before him—including his wife and children! In the long run he comes out a good ways behind his more efficient and more enlightened neighbor, who takes things easily and does things pleasantly, and steers clear of that kind of haste which makes waste. The first step toward making boys "hate the farm" is to cut down their rightful hours of sleep, and make the beginning of every day thoroughly wretched to them.—American Agriculturist.

MANAGEMENT OF SICK CHILDREN.

The vicissitudes necessarily incident to an outdoor and primitive mode of life are never the first causes of any disease, though they may sometimes betray its presence. Bronchitis, nowadays perhaps the most frequent of all infantile diseases, makes no exception to this rule; a draft of cold air may reveal the latent progress of the disorder, but its cause is long confinement in a vitiated and overheated atmosphere, and its proper remedy ventilation and a mild, phlegm-loosening (saccharine) diet, warm, sweet milk, sweet oatmeal-porridge, or honey-water. Select an airy bedroom, and do not be afraid to open the windows. Among the children of the Indian tribes who brave in open tents the terrible winters of the Hudson Bay territory, bronchitis, croup, and diphtheria are wholly unknown; and what we call "taking cold" might often be more correctly described as taking hot; glowing stoves, and even open fires, in a night-nursery, greatly aggravate the pernicious effects of an impure atmosphere. The first paroxysm of croup can be promptly relieved by very simple remedies; fresh air and a rapid forward-and-backward movement of the arms, combined in urgent cases with the application of a flesh-brush (or piece of flannel) to the neck and upper part of the chest. Paregoric and poppy-syrup stop the cough by lethargizing the irritability, and thus preventing the discharge of the phlegm till its accumulation produces a second and far more dangerous paroxysm. These second attacks of croup (after the administration of palliatives) are generally the fatal ones. When the child is convalescing, let him beware of stimulating food and overheated rooms. Do not give aperient medicines; costiveness, as an after-effect of pleuritic affections, will soon yield to fresh air and a vegetable diet.—Popular Science Monthly.

Many a promising child has been hurried to the grave or crippled in intellect and enfeebled in body by overstudy. A little eight-year-old girl in Philadelphia died a few days ago from brain fever, in which her delirious thoughts were all about examples in arithemetic. She had been in mortal fear of being set back a grade by failure at examination. Common sense in the school room is one of the chief needs of the period.

LITTLE HEADS TOGETHER.

LET IT ALONE.

BY E. T. LARKIN.

Do not touch it, my boy,
Let the wine-glass alone,
'Twill your manhood destroy
And your heart turn to stone.

There's a snake in the glass;
See its eyes sparkle there;
It will charm you at last
Down to realms of despair.

If you taste, step by step
Ever downward you'll go,
From the gates of despair
To the regions of woe.

Turn away from the glass;
Dash it down, while you can;
Face to face fight the foe
If you'd be a true man.

Would you keep your brain clear,
And have strength to endure,
And your heart and step light,
Oh! then keep yourself pure.

BAND OF HOPE BIBLE LESSON.

SUBJECT, REFORM.

Golden Text.—"Prepare ye the way of the Lord. Make straight in the desert a highway for our God."—Isaiah 40: 3.

Ques. 1. What is the subject of this lesson? Ans. Reform.

2. What is the meaning of reform? To put into a new and improved condition. Amendment of what is defective, vicious, corrupt or depraved.

3. When a drunkard signs the pledge, and becomes sober and temperate, what do we say of him? That he is reformed.

Repeat the Golden Text.

4. To what event did this prophecy refer? To the preaching of John the Baptist. (Matt. 3: 1.)

5. What is the meaning of repent ye? It signifies in the original Greek a change of mind or purpose, and as used by John was equivalent to our English word reform.

6. Was there a great need of reform in the Jewish nation at this time? There was. The mass of the people were content with a dead and formal religion. Many of our Saviour's public addresses were directed against popular abuses which had crept in through the false teaching of the scribes and Pharisees, who set aside the commandments of God and taught instead their own traditions. See Luke 11: 39–54; Matt. 15: 1–9.

7. Why did John the Baptist begin his preaching by exhorting the people to "repent" or reform? Because, as the forerunner of Christ, his office was to prepare the hearts of the Jewish nation for a new spiritual kingdom. Their hypocrisy and formality and indifference to popular sins, unless removed, would be great obstacles in the way of the Gospel.

8. What particular evils did John point out to the people that needed to be reformed? Luke 3: 10–15.

9. What must take place before there can be any great reform in a church or nation? Each one must try to reform his or her heart and life by breaking off from what they know to be sinful.

10. What five great evils in our own country call for reform? Secretism, Sabbath breaking, profanity, intemperance and tobacco.

11. What can you do to help on the cause of reform? We can do what we can. See Mark 14: 8.

12. Name some reasons why even children should do all they can for reform.

Ans. Because these things are sinful.
Because God commands us to fight against all sin.
Because they greatly injure our country.
Because they are an injury to the human race.
Because it is consenting to sin when we feel careless or indifferent at seeing others sin.
Because God has promised a reward to those who overcome.

13. What are some of the practical truths taught in this lesson?

Ans. That reform prepares the way for God.
That he wants everybody to aid in the work.
That even the youngest can do something.

BOYS AND TOBACCO.

Why do most boys have such a hard time learning to use tobacco? Why did Fred, after using that old pipe, hurry off to bed the other night without any supper? Why did John turn so pale and ask his companions to help him one afternoon when he went out with some older boys into the pine grove, or down under the hill, out of sight, to have his first smoke? Why did mother become so frightened and suggest that the doctor be called when Charlie became so terribly sick after smoking a cigar? Let me tell you. There is poison in tobacco, and when a boy begins to use it, his stomach and his whole system rebel. Give a piece of tobacco to an elephant and, if possible, he will strike you a hard blow with his trunk. Now that sickness is the blow your physical system is aiming at you for giving self that tobacco. You never would attempt the second time to give tobacco to an elephant, and if you are a wise boy you will never try to use it yourself more than once.

Dr. Willard Parker, one of the leading physicians in New York city, says: "It is now many years since my attention was called to the insidious but positively destructive effects of tobacco on the human system. I have seen a great deal of its influence upon those who use it and work in it. Cigar and snuff manufacturers have come under my care in hospitals and private practice, and such persons cannot recover soon and in a healthy manner from cases of injury or fever. They are more apt to die in epidemic and more prone to apoplexy and paralysis. The same is true of those who chew and smoke. In my opinion, the habitual use of tobacco shortens a man's life at least ten years. The poison slowly but surely destroys life."

Dr. Marshall writes: "The smoker cannot escape the poison of tobacco. It gets into the blood, travels the whole round of his system, interferes with his heart's action and general circulation, and effects every organ and fiber of the frame."

Dr. Brown, of Providence, R. I., says: "The symptoms liable to arise from the habitual use of tobacco in any form may be any of the following: Dizziness, headache, faintness, pain at the pit of the stomach, weakness, tremulousness, hoarseness, disturbed sleep, irritability of temper, seasons of mental depression, epileptic fits and sometimes mental derangement."

Dr. Hosack says: "The alarming frequency of apoplexy and palsy and epilepsy, and other nervous diseases, is attributable to the use of tobacco."

Dr. Ferguson says: "I believe that no one who smokes tobacco before his bodily powers are developed, ever makes a vigorous man."

Last year a man in my town was taken very suddenly and painfully sick, and for days his friends and physicians despaired of his life. When he had recovered sufficiently to talk, he said the cause was smoking fifteen cigars daily.

Dr. Prince, for a long time superintendent of the insane asylum, Northampton, Mass., says: "Fully half of the patients who have come to our asylum for treatment are victims of tobacco."

After the death of United States Senator Carpenter, a few months ago, an intimate friend wrote: "Died from smoking twenty cigars a day."

Only a few months age the distinguished United States Senator Hill from Georgia, died a most painful death from cancer in the mouth, produced by the use of tobacco.

Now what boy that reads these satements in regard to the injurious effects of tobacco, will not say: "Give me health and strength, give me long life and happy old age, before all the pleasure that comes from the use of the poisonous weed?"—Vermont Chronicle.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

At the city of Cairo, upon the southern extremity of the State of Illinois, are gathered together the waters of five great rivers, viz.: the Missouri, the Upper Mississippi, the Ohio, the Cumberland, and the Tennessee. Between that point and the Gulf of Mexico lies the Mississippi River proper, 1,097 miles in length as it flows. Its course is through an alluvial plain, six hundred miles long and from twenty-five to eighty miles wide. In this basin is embraced an area of 41,000 square miles, of which 32,000 square miles are liable to overflow. Borings made at eighty-three places between Cairo and Vicksburg show one hundred and thirty-one feet mean depth of alluvial soil. From Cairo to the mouth of the Red, the width of the river between banks varies from 1,900 to 13,800 feet, the mean being 4,400 feet. Below the Red the width rarely exceeds 3,500 feet, the mean being 3,350. Between Cairo and Memphis its least depth at low water is five feet; between Memphis and Red River, six feet; and between Red River and New Orleans, fifteen feet. The variation in its discharge is enormous, passing from 100,000 cubic feet per second at low water to 1,600,000 at the highest flood. The range between high and low water mark at Cairo is fifty-two feet; at Memphis, thirty-five feet; at Vicksburg, fifty-two feet; and at New Orleans, fourteen feet. In its greatest flood its water surface stretches from hill to hill, across the entire valley; at extreme low water it flows between banks from thirty to forty feet high. The depth of its inundation bears no comparison with its area, being, on an average, less than three feet over the arable lands. In the swamps it is much more. Its flood elevation at Cairo is three hundred and twenty-two feet above the sea. Its fall from Cairo to Memphis is about six inches to the mile. Thence to the gulf its fall steadily diminishes, being about one and a half inches per mile at New Orleans. It is one of the muddiest rivers in the world. The greater portion of the sediment received by it at Cairo comes from the Missouri, but this supply is constantly reinforced by the caving of its own banks, which are washed into the river at an estimated rate of 5,000 acres per annum.

TEMPERANCE.

HOW IT WORKS.

In Adrian, Michigan, at the beginning of the Temperance Crusade, there were fifty-two licensed dram shops. In less than ten days these were all virtually closed, and remained so for more than six weeks. "The result was that the jails soon became empty, for the first time in the history of the county; with one exception only, which occurred in the early settlement of the State. The average jail and criminal expenses of the county, previous to the temperance movement, were $1,000 per month; but during the time the saloons were closed these expenses were only $50 per month—a saving per month of $950."

The rum traffic is a steady drain upon the resources of any country where it exists. All legitimate business produces something desirable. The workshops turn out wagons, ploughs, tools, furniture, hats, shoes, clothes, and all the articles necessary to civilized life. What does the rum-shop turn out? It absorbs millions of capital; it is often owned by the church; it has the protection of the law; it is defended by the newspapers; it is supported by the politicians; it is protected by the police, and needs more protection than any other business; it is allowed to run more hours in the day and more days in the year than any legitimate business; and now what is the product? What does the shop turn out?

It turns out red noses, bleared eyes, shaking nerves and broken constitutions. It turns out rogues, roughs, rowdies, hoodlums, thieves, gamblers, prostitutes, maniacs and murderers. It turns out wreck, ruin, disaster, bankruptcy, debt, disease, death, and damnation. And this is the business that governments foster, politicians support, church members license, devils rejoice over, and honest men pay for.—The Safeguard.

UNFERMENTED WINE.

If it is wrong to use leavened bread at the communion table, what shall we say in relation to the use of wine which contains leaven at the same table? Can we discern the cup of blessing in that which has proven to be to, alas! to many of earth's suffering ones the cup of devils? Did our Lord ever sanction the use of that which he knew would be the cause of more misery than all other combined causes?

Was it the custom at the passover feast to allow any leaven of any kind anywhere in the house? If so, why do the faithful Jews of to-day (who claim to keep the very letter) "purge out" all leaven from their dwellings—not only bread raised with yeast, but also alcoholic wine, using bread made from flour and water, and the "fruit of the vine" made by boiling raisins in water?

Why should a poor reformed drunkard, the first time he sits down to his Maker's table, be confronted by the devil in the shape of his old enemy rum, presented to him by the same good deacon who prayed for him when he knelt a penitent at the altar? Is this the cup that is to be drank "new in the kingdom of God?"—World's Crisis.

Very well Answered.—It is said that the late Bishop Doane, of New Jersey, was very far from being a total abstainer from intoxicating beverages. On one occasion a Mr. Perkins, who was decided in his total abstinence principles, dined with the Bishop, who, pouring out a glass of wine, desired him to drink it with him.

"Can't do it, bishop. 'Wine is a mocker.'"

"Take a glass of brandy, then."

"Can't do it, bishop. 'Strong drink is raging.'"

By this time, the bishop, becoming somewhat excited, remarked to Mr. Perkins, "You'll pass the decanter to the gentleman next to you."

"No, bishop, I can't do that. 'Woe unto him that putteth the bottle to his neighbor's lips.'"

The Abuse of Liberty.—No man has a right to destroy his intellect and make himself an insane person by the use of liquor. No man has a right to indulge in a practice which almost uniformly impairs his intelligence, his self-conteol, degrades his conscience, in some degree, and in many, even thousands of cases, results in insanity.

No man has a right to indulge in a habit which disposes him to acts of violence; which destroys his human tendencies, his sympathies, his better affections; which blinds him, infuriates him; which puts the man below the brute and devil above; which makes him one disposed to smite and hurt and injure and destroy his fellows. No man has a right to make the street by day or by night, or the public house, or the ferry-boat, or any common ground unsafe for other men or for women or children.

The community has a right to protect itself from the sult of the use of intoxicants, and the day is not far away when the right will be asserted and incorporated in the law, and the law be vigorously executed. The number of persons no longer disposed to submit to the evils resulting from the use of liquors is steadily increasing.—Christian Intelligencer.

American Politics.

NOMINATIONS FOR 1884.

For President,
JONATHAN BLANCHARD
OF ILLINOIS.

For Vice President,
JOHN A. CONANT,
OF CONNECTICUT.

PLATFORM.

We hold: 1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That God requires and man needs a Sabbath.

3. That the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is the true policy on the temperance question.

4. That the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

5. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by articles 13th, 14th and 15th of our amended Constitution should be preserved inviolate.

6. That arbitration of differences with nations is the most direct and sure method of securing and perpetuating a permanent peace.

7. That to cultivate the intellect without improving the morals of men, is to make mere adepts and experts; therefore, the Bible should be associated with book of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

8. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

9. That the government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

10. That maintenance of the public credit, protection to all loyal citizens, and justice to Indians are essential to the honor and safety of our nation.

11. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice-president of the United States.

MORAL TRAINING IN SCHOOLS.

There is a great lack of moral training of young people, not only in the homes, but in our public schools. The reading of the Bible in the public schools has always been met with vigorous protests, and the ordinary textbooks are usually innocent of any moral instruction, except what is taught by inference, and that fails to meet the demand. What is imperatively demanded in our public schools is a regular course of moral teaching, which shall be adapted to the comprehension of all classes of pupils. Because our common school-teaching does not provide for this kind of moral instruction, the Catholic denomination siezes upon it as an excuse for opposing it, and for establishing parochial schools of their own, in which they see to it that the special tenets of their church are also inculcated. All the statistics of all the penal institutions and alms-houses in this country, and in all civilized countries, go to prove that the most prolific cause of crime is connected with the sale and use of alcoholic liquors; and in looking about for ways and means to prevent crime, we stumble upon the demoralizing traffic. And so it may be laid down as a general proposition that to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks in any community, or to reduce the use to the minimum, would be to dry up at its fountain-head one of the chief sources of crime, pauperism, and wickedness. No intelligent person will deny this broad but truthful assertion, and, with all the astonishing facts before us in respect to the criminality springing from strong drink, the Christian and the philanthropist feel justified in adopting the most heroic treatment in dealing with this giant evil.—Chicago Journal.

The Chicago Journal strenuously insisted, we are told, on the exclusion of the Bible from public schools, and now finding, like the French statesman who abolished the Sabbath, that some substitute is needed, it comes out as strenuously in favor of teaching morality. But where is morality to be found apart from the Bible? The Ten Commandments and the teaching of Christ and his inspired Apostles contain an authoritative and reliable code of morals, before which the morality of the Grecians, Romans, Hindoos,. Mohammedans, Chinese, Voltaire, Paine, and Ingersoll are mere dross as compared with fine gold. The best book next to the New Testament was one prepared by Protestant and Roman Catholic bishops, consisting of selections from the Scripture for the Irish national schools; and it would be well, if we cannot get the whole Bible into schools, at least to get that volume of extracts from it, specially suitable for the young.—N. Y. Witness.

SOURCES OF OUR NATIONAL DANGER.

A ship sailing rapidly in a smooth sea amid hidden reefs and shoals, is in more danger than when tossed about by a hurricane in mid-ocean. In the former case, all on board are secure and careless. In the latter, all are watchful and elert, What are the dangers which threaten our ship of State?

1. Illiteracy. The Boston Monday Lecturer has lately brought forward a series of facts that are absolutely appalling. Out of fifty-two millions, five millions cannot read; six and one-quarter millions cannot write. Out of twelve millions of voters, one in every five cannot read his vote. Out of eighteen millions of children of a school age, only ten millions are enrolled, and six millions in regular attendance; eight millions never enter the schoolroom; twelve millions are always out. In thirty-four of our leading cities from fifty to eighty per cent. do not attend. In eighty-six cities, comprising an eighth of our population, two-thirds are away from school. In New York, out of 385,000 children of a school age, 140,000 attend; 271,000 do not. In Chicago, fifty-seven per cent. are out; forty-three per cent. attend. In St. Louis, of 106,000 children, 55,000 are enrolled; 36,000 attend. In Cincinnati, 27,000 attend; 51,000 do not. In the South, two-thirds of the voters cannot read their ballots. In New Mexico, fifty-seven per cent. of the whites and sixty-nine per cent. of the blacks can neither read or write. In Alaska, a province directly under the authority of Congress, no provision is made for educating her 30,000. These facts form a dark and threatening cloud in our political sky. Let a master hand touch it, and the thunders will roll, the lightnings flash and a deluge of wrath descend upon us.

2. Communism. It shows itself in different forms. In Russia, it is Nihilism; in France, it is communism; in Ireland, it is socialism; in America, it is Liberalism. It is one and the same spirit everywhere. Herr Johan Most, its apostle in America, demands that all civil officers and capitalists be assassinated, the banks robbed and the money distributed among the poor, and the railroads and steamboats be made free. It means the abolition of property, the abolition of the family, the abolition of the State, the abolition of the church, the abolition of inheritance. The recent assassination in Spain, the King killing "bombs" of Russia, the cold-blooded murders and cruel boycotting in Ireland, and the strikes and mobs of America are some of its latest fruits. It reached its height of evil in the French Revolution. Infidelity is its master. spirit. Every infidel is in the last resort a communist The spirit appears weak as yet. But let the first blood be drawn, let the tocsin sound and all the elements for enacting the French Reign of Terror will be called forth.

3. Secretism. The Masons with their degree of apprentice, fellow-craft and Grand Master, together with the whole brood of inferior order, form the dry rot in our political body. They are an enemy to both Church and State. They are anti-Republican and anti-Christian. Their ensnaring and blasphemous oaths forever proscribe them.

4. Roman Catholicism. It is admitted that the Roman Catholic church was originally the true church of Christ. She existed five centuries before the Papacy, and fifteen centuries before the Society of Jesus. The Papacy was inaugurated in 606, when Phocas declared Boniface universal bishop. Jesuitry was inaugurated by Ignatius Loyola in the cave of Euresain 1554. Originally the temple of God, she has become the synagogue of Satan. The Roman Hierarchy, with the Pope and his College of Cardinals at Rome, and their arch-bishops, bishops and priests, their Jesuitical missionaries form an organization as perfect as my hand, the rest of which is yonder on the Tiber and the fingers are in all countries manipulating their institutions. Semper Eadem is their motto. What they were in the past they are to-day. In 1192 Pope Celestine kicked the crown from the head of Henri VI., to indicate his subjection. In 1077 Pope Gregory VII., kept Henri IV., emperor of Germany, standing bareheaded and barefooted for three days in midwinter outside the gates of Canossa, before granting absolution. In 1872 Bismarck declared in the German parliament, "We are not going to Canossa either physically or spiritually!" And yet to day Bismarck is counting the favor of the Ultramontane party and King William is negotiating with the Vatican. In 1300 Boniface VIII. wrote to Philip the Fair, emperor of France, "Boniface the Pope, to Philip the Fair, greetings. Know thou, O Supreme Prince, that thou art subject to us in all things." Philip responded thus tartly, "Philip the Fair to Boniface, little or no greetings. "Know thou, O Supreme fool, that in governmental matters we are subject to you nor no other man." All France re-echoed the scorn of Philip the Fair. But France sunk back into the arms of Popish despotism—and to-day she is engaged in a life and death struggle with the great Red Dragon. Gladstone warns the English nation that the time is not yet past for them to despise or neglect the intrigues of the hierarchy. And yet they are to-day sending a minister to the vatican to the disgrace of our Protestant civilization. America should not shut her eyes upon the doings of the Jesuits. They hold the balance of power between the two great political parties. Many of our municipalities are under their control. The prison doors of Massachusetts have been opened to them. They are admitted in the reformatory institution of New York. What by the vast wealth they are accumulating, what by the enormous sums contributed by an unthinking Protestant church and a thoughtless Republic, and what by their schools, colleges, convents, churches, asylums, and elee-mosynary institutions and orders, they are becoming a power that may well be dreaded. Let this go on until their mediaeval strength is gained, and then like the victim of the inquisition kissing the maiden, we will be cut in pieces by the knives that always accompany the embraces of the "mother of harlots."

5. Political Corruption. Speak of it as mildly as we may, it is absolutely repelling. Our nation adopted a constitution that is silent as the grave respecting the authority of God or the claims of his law. That ungodly instrument naturally attracts into office men of immoral character. Hence our government is groaning beneath a load of political tricksters whose sole object is "the spoils of office"—that is plunder. Our officials are constantly engaged in schemes for the purpose of displacing and defeating one another. A man is scarcely considered an available candidate by either party who has not a barrel to tap. Congress continued its last session through the Sabbath day, accomplishing no practical results except to take "too much whisky out of bond," to the disgrace of our Christian civilization and the dishonor of the Lord of the Sabbath day. The fair commonweath of Indiana is disgraced by a Legislature whose staple characteristics were dishonesty, licentiousness and drunkenness. "Shall not I visit for these things, saith the Lord?"

"When Niceshones Phocas had built a mighty strong wall about his palace for his own security, in the nighttime he heard a voice crying out to him, 'O emperor, though thou buildest thy wall as high as the clouds, yet if sin be within it will overthrow all!' And most true it is that all sin is of a destructive nature. What though our nation be in as good a position as heart can wish, our navy ready, our coasts guarded, all our men armed, yet if sins be within, if bribery, hatred, malice be in the midst of us, like those traitors in the Trojan horse, any one of them will do more hurt in one night than ten thousand open enemies in ten years."—Rev. J. M. Foster in the Christian Statesman.

The Churches.

—Bro. M. L. Comer, pastor of the United Brethren church near Sycamore, Ill., writes of a glorious revival in which some seventy persons have begun to live thel new life in Christ.

—Two hundred of the students in the Ohio Wesleyan University have recently professed conversion, and others manifest anxiety concerning their highest interests.

—Two hundred accessions to the Congregational churches of Chicago and vicinity in one Sabbath have been reported in the Minister's meeting, and 116 of them on profession. The number of members received by the various churches on the preceeding Sunday was about 600, of whom 293 came in on profession of faith.

—The American Bible Society is pushing its great work of supplying with the Bible every family in the United States that is without one. The latest report states that 244 colporteurs are now at work in twenty-five States and three Territories, and many of the auxiliaries are also engaged in the canvass of their respective fields.

—Superintendent E. P. Hart, of the Free Methodist church, lately organized a class of twelve members in San Jose, California, among whom was James Kennedy, one of the best known of the supporters of reform work in that part of the State.

—Rev. B. T. Roberts, of Rochester, N. Y., visited Washington City and preached on the Sabbath.

—Rev. E. W. Bruce, of Michigan, writes to the Wesleyan that he has been engaged in revival meetings for more than three months, holding two services a day most of the time. His last work was at South Jackson.

—Rev. G. P. Riley, Illinois Wesleyan Conference evangelist, reports an interesting case of faith-healing at Marengo. Miss Alice Burt, a young lady of 22 years of age, was raised up from what her friends and physicans believed to be her dying bed, in answer to prayer. Her disease was consumption. A Miss Vaughn is reported in the Wheaton local paper as having lately been healed of cancer by the same gracious power.

—Philadelphia has 93 Reunited Presbyterian churches, and 42 more United and Reformvd, making a practical Presbyterian front there of 135 churches.

"The memorial statue of the martyr, William Tyndale, first translator of the New Testament into English, has been cast," says the Evening Post, "and it will be placed at the west end of the West Garden, on the Thames Embankment, London. On the pedestal will be inscribed the names of about twenty counties, towns, universities, and societies in Great Britain, the colonies, and the United States which have contributed toward defraying the cost of the memorial. The statue, which has been designed by Mr. Boehm, represents Tyndale in his doctor's robes, with his right hand on an open New Testament."

—The statistics brought out by the Decennial Conference in India are important and encouraging. The number of native Christians in India, Burmah and Ceylon in 1871 was 318,363; in 1881, 528,590. In India alone the numbers were, in 1871, 224,258; in 1881, 419,372—an increase of 83 per cent. The number of communicants in India in 1871 was 52,816; in 1881 it was 113,325—being more than doubled in ten years. Certainly there is no evidence here that Christian missions are dying out.

—One hundred and fifty Italian children are attending a Protestant Mission Sunday school in New York City. An Italian branch of the Young Men's Christian Association of that city has been organized.

—Mr. McAll's mission in Paris and its environs has now thirty-one halls in different parts of the city for evangelical meetings, with sitting accommodations for 5,890 persons, and in twenty-eight other localities there are forty-nine halls, with accommodation for 7,340 persons; 10,500 meetings for adults and children have been held during the past year, attended by 716,000 perosns. The expenses during the last year were about £12,000.

—The chaplain of the Hampton Institute says that there has been a noteworthy revival among the students, more than eighty of whom have been recently converted.

—The two colored professors for Liberia College, Messrs. Stewart and Browne, sailed from this port last week, to give their lives to the cause of education in Africa. They have with them Ulysees Parklew, a lad of sixteen years, who is said to be entitled to the succession to the chieftancy of the Pessah tribe.

—The Rev. R. W. Dale, of Birmingham, England, gives it as the result of eight years' experience, that fully seventy per cent. of the converts of Moody and Sankey at their previous visit continue to stand firm in their new faith.

—An English paper states that "General" Booth has modified the methods of the Salvation Army, so as to do away in London with street processions, and limit the marchings, counter-marchings, trumpet blowings, and drum beatings to the boundaries of the "barracks." He has been moved to do this by the rude, cruel, and riotous persecutions which the army has suffered at the hands of "roughs."

—Messrs. Moody and Sankey closed their mission at Belfast, Ireland, February 18th. The crowds which attended were even greater than on their former visit, eight years ago. It was estimated that 12,000 persons were at the several meetings each day, On the second day it was found necessary to remove the Bible-reading to St. Enoch's, the largest church in town. The number of anxious inquirers was very large. It is said that Messrs. Moody and Sankey will return for a brief visit to this country after two weeks of labor in Liverpool in April.

—Joseph Cook recently asked all the Christians in his audience to rise. About 2,000 to 2,500 arose in answer to his invitation. He then asked all those who did not come into the church in a time of special religious awakening, to sit down, and over half remained standing. These facts seem to indicate that Mr. Cook's Boston audiences are composed chiefly of church members, and that even in the religious city of Boston a large proportion of church-members are fruits of revival labors.

A DELIGHTFUL REVIVAL.

DETROIT, Mich.

By legitimate inference there are revivals that are not delightful. Christians of much experience know that there are revivals so-called, that have not only nothing delightful, but that have in them elements that are the exact opposite.

1st. As when there are unsettled quarrels among those engaged in the revival work.

2d. Where a church has lost its first love and has not repented.

3d. Or where people engage in the work with hard and unsympathizing hearts.

4th. When manifestly not filled with the Spirit.

5th. But especially so when the preacher is afraid to expose and rebuke popular sins, that may be festering in the church.

6th. And doubly and fearfully undelightful is a revival work, where the sworn devotees of secret clans kneeling betimes at the idolatrous shrine of Baal, are received into fellowship with the true friends and worshipers of God.

7th. But where, as not unfrequently occurs, the leading preacher is himself in full fellowship with the infidels and scoffers, with blasphemers and libertines that riot and revel around the altars of the unknown God of secretism, the performance that passes for a revival is not only undelightful, but abominable, detestable and develish.

The revival of which I am about to write has none of the above unlovely characteristics; hence we had none of them to encounter, as we have to in nearly all places. There is not a lodge in the place and but one or two residents of the cable-tow persuasion.

In nearly every revival I have been in for years I have had to encounter these sons of darkness, and of secrecy, but not so in this one. On entering the place of worship the first time, the presence of God was so palpably manifest that the most unsympathetic could but feel it. The revival had been in progress some time, such a hush of expectation, such a mellowness of sensibility, such a unity of sympathy filled and pervaded the audience, that one could but exclaim "surely God is in this place."

In the community at large no "apple of discord" was present to alienate or distract from the work. The people were all "of one accord in prayer and supplication with the women." No plurality of denominations were in the place, to proselyte and quarrel over the converts. Allbeit there were representative members of denominations from abroad, all harmoniously and lovingly laboring night and day for the one supreme object, the salvation of the perishing, sympathizing so completely in that object that no stranger would have guessed that they were not all of that one church and community. The freeness and readiness with which the old and young, old Christians and young converts entered into the service of prayer and testimony were most charming to behold. The time was too short at every meeting. And the "singing of the Gospel" seemed quite as affectual as the preaching. Crowds of mischief-loving young men would come into the meeting, but the first song would sober them to perfect order to the close. But the most lovely of all the accompanyments of the revival, was the hopeful conversion of nearly every member of the Sunday-school. To see such an array of youth, night after night, of their own accord, separating themselves from the rest of the congregation, coming to the front and sitting compact in a long row, was a spectacle never to be forgotten. We closed the last of the fourth week with a grand song and testimony service. The pastor, Rev. W. H. Blair, conducted the exercises of the evening. There were tears of sorrow over the unsaved, but a more joyous season was never witnessed in Augusta. If Paul was comforted "by the coming of Titus," so were we by the coming of our dear brother J. P. Stoddard at the last hour, whose intercession and words of admonition gave special interest to the closing service. C. C. FOOTE.

AN INSTRUCTIVE CASE:

A Baptist minister of unquestioned standing was invited by the pulpit committee of a Baptist church, to visit said church, with the view of becoming its pastor. The minister in question candidly and very plainly defined his views on the subject of the relation of the church to the lodge, informing the committee that he could not administer the ordinances to adhering members of secret orders. After a time the minister gets a letter from the brother, who first wrote him, thanking the minister for his "frankness in the expression of his views on secret orders," and claiming to be "in agreement" with said views. This brother had not supposed "there was a lodge member in the church till," said he to the minister, your letter called him out." This lodge-bound soul proved to be one of the pulpit committee. The result can, in the light of present church policy, be predicted by a poor prophet. "We do not think it best under the circumstances, to give you a call, etc." So thought the minister, too—on the condition, however, that the church had not the backbone to stand erect on the living issues of these times.

But what are our churches thinking of, when one lodge man in an anti-lodge church settles and unsettles her pastors? Baptist churches boast of being purely republican in their government. When one man can settle the question of settling the pastor of a church, such a church must be intensely republican! Brother Crossbones is a good man and we must not displease him. He knows just what will suit the lodge and he will choose for himself and the lodge too—and the church will let him do it. Masonry responds "So mote it be." This is the way the churches have of obeying God who says: "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness but rather reprove them." When will this thing end?

NATHAN CALLENDER.

OBITUARY.

DRURY HOLT, SR.

Father Drury Holt died March 11th, 1883, aged 82. The subject of this notice was one of our true friends in reform. Born and brought up in Tennessee, he, without the help of literary attainments at an early age, by the impulse of his own natural love of personal and general freedom, learned to despise the oppressive system of slavery. He has often related to me how, when a mere boy his whole nature was stirred and shocked at the cruelty and injustice practiced upon the poor slave. This largely constituted his motive for moving to Indiana, near Carthage, Rush county, where, surrounded by an almost unbroken wilderness, with all its difficulties and privations, he hewed out a beautiful home, and reared to adult life a large family of sons and daughters, whose citizenship is above reproach, and who can look back to a father, who with his whole nature loved justice, exalted the good and true, followed kindness and peace, and with all the force of his nature hated a mean trick. "Uncle Drury," as he was generally called, was a minister in the Disciple church, and for forty years he preached the Gospel as he understood it, often making long journeys through an unbroken forest to do his Master's will, and this without compensation, till he received it in the upper fold. Many a neighborhood in Central Indiana will kindly remember his visits.

Uncle Drury in his make-up was not composed of a single type of character, his shafts of satire and infinite fund of wit never failed him, and often in private and public convulsed his hearers with laughter. In early life he "joined the Masons;" became a Master Mason; but the frivolities did not suit the high cast of his better sense and he abandoned it and never failed to give his testimony against the institution, often going long distances to discuss the subject with members of the order. A worldly doctor in Delaware county will never forget his discussion with Uncle Drury. The doctor in his speech regretted that Uncle Drury could not hear his argument (as his hearing had somewhat failed). Quick as thought he replied, "It don't make a bit of difference, you're saying nothing to the point." A Methodist minister of pompous pretentions was so completely routed that he was glad to escape from the laughter of the neighborhood. A minister of his own denomination once interrupted him by suggesting that a special time be appointed to discuss the subject. Uncle Drury suspecting the real motive was to stop the testimony against the lodge, instantly replied, That he thought the "best time to shoot is when the game's in sight." In all his fun I never heard him repeat a vulgar or pointless story. The foregoing traits were of no trifling nature. It was a part of the warp and woof of his nature, as natural as his breathing. God gave it to him as well as a high spirituality, he was true to his convictions and loved his devotions, and thus this plain, unassuming, sincere friend, after leaving all along the path of a long life, traces of honor and integrity, has come to the peaceful death and the better life he so often loved to speak of. Rush county has lost a good citizen and neighbor, and we have lost a friend. S. L. COOK.

DAVID H. ROGERS died of heart disease after a brief illness in the 76th year of his age, and the thirtieth of his connection with the Wesleyan church. His home was near Parma, Jackson country, Mich., where he had lived over forty years, and was highly esteemed for his honesty in dealing, devotion to the cause of Christ and conscientious defense of what he believed to be right. He was one of the most active Abolitionists in the early struggle in Michigan, and was equally zealous in opposition to all secret societies. He has been an intelligent reader of the Cynosure for years, and active in extending its circulation. Among his last acts he forwarded a list of twenty trial subscribers, and although he was called away without seeing all accomplished he desired, he has his higher reward now that he rests from his labors and his works do follow him.

THE
CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE
A NEATLY PRINTED SIXTEEN PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL, UNSECTARIAN AND OPPOSED TO SECRET SOCIETIES.

THE POLE STAR OF REFORM.

EVERY Christian, every Prohibitionist and every Patriot should read it for the following among other reasons:

1. Because it meets the wants of the general public by giving in brief the latest reliable information on all questions of Reform, having the special object of exposing and opposing organized secrecy. Besides able editorial, contributed and selected articles upon this topic, which is of more than national importance, it has interesting sketches of progress and incidents from the reform lecturers in all parts of the country, reform news and notes, letters from the Old World, etc., etc. It is the especial organ of this movement in America—a movement which is sustained by the utterances of some of the ablest statesmen and divines whom the country has produced. Every person interested in either the family, government, or religion—the most sacred interests of humanity—is directly affected by secret societies, and needs to keep posted in this movement.

2. Because it is uncompromising on ALL questions of the day. On temperance, tobacco, Sabbath desecration, Mormonism, the Southern and Indian questions, civil-service reform, monopolies, the rights of labor, and every other question, its only aim is to be RIGHT, and advocate the TRUTH. It is hence FEARLESS and OUTSPOKEN.

2. Because it emphasizes the fact that political action should be directed by conscience enlightened by the WORD and SPIRIT of God and that Christ must be acknowledged KING of NATIONS, and presents a platform epitomizing the science of civil governments based on the supreme authority of the DIVINE WORD.

4. Because, in addition to these features, it contains a choice selection of wholesome reading for the family, from oldest to youngest, with religious and secular news, market reports, etc.

THE FARM.

THE GOOD OLD PLOUGH.

Let them sing who may of the battle fray,
And the deeds that have long since past;
Let them chant in praise of the tar whose days
Are spent on the ocean vast;
I would render to these all the worship you please.
I would honor them even now;
But I'd give far more from my heart's full store
To the cause of the Good Old Plough.

Let them laud the notes that in music float
Through the bright and glittering hall,
While the amorous twirl of the hair's bright curl
Round the shoulders of beauty fall.
But dearer to me is the song from the tree,
And the rich and blossoming bough;
O, these are the sweets which the rustic greets
As he follows the Good Old Plough.

Full many there be that daily we see
With a selfish and hollow pride,
Who the ploughman's lot in his humble cot
With a scornful look deride.
But I'd rather take aye a hearty shake
From his hand than to wealth I'd bow;
For the honest grasp of his hand's rough clasp
Has stood by the Good Old Plough.

All honor he, then, to these gray old men
When at last they are bowed with toil;
Their warfare then o'er, they battle no more,
For they've conquered the stubborn soil;
And the chaplet each wears is his silver hairs,
And ne'er shall the victor's brow
With a laurel crown to the grave go down
Like the sons of the Good Old Plough.

ORIGIN OF THE PLOUGH.

Dr. Tylor states that the first agricultural implement seems to have been a pointed stick four or five feet long, such as many savage tribes still carry for the purpose of digging roots, knocking down fruits and unearthing animals. At a later day the stick was bent and used as a hoe, the point being hardened by fire. In the southern part of Sweden large tracts of land give evidence of early cultivation, which is attributed to a prehistoric people called by the natives the "hackers," who are always associated with the giants of mythology, and whose rude hoe was a fir pole with a short projecting branch. There came into use afterwards a larger instrument of the same kind, which was not used like the hoe but dragged by men or oxen. Instances of this are to be found in old Egyptian pictures and basreliefs, and it was probably the primitive idea of the plough, which is of prehistoric origin, evidences being found of its early use among the Greeks, Egyptians and Chinese. It had from the earliest times a religious sanction. The next improvement was a wooden hook shod with iron; and in the time of Virgil a wheeled plough was in use which differed but little from the best in Europe a century ago.

AN INGENIOUS PLOWMAN.

A gentleman from the country, who came to town the other day, reported a novel plowing arrangement which he saw as he passed along the road. A negro man was opening a furrow with a mule hitched to the plow. Behind him came a girl dropping the seed. The man had a kind of man-harness on, and he was pulling another plow, which was guided by a woman, to cover the seed. Not having but one mule, he put that one on double duty, by making it help to pull him, while he pulled the second plow. This was not a bad idea from an economic point of view, though it must have put the sturdy plowman's strength to a severe test.—Monroe (Ga.) Paper.

STEAM PLOWING.

Mr. A. G. Allen, of Leeds, Eng., agent for John Fowler & Co., the manufacturers of steam plows at Leeds, Eng., is accomplishing some excellent work on the Aurora farm, belonging to Capt. Thomas W. Hunt, at Blanchard, Dakota. It is attracting a great deal of attention, and farmers are coming in long distances to see the plow at work. The mechanism is thus described by a correspondent of the Boston Journal:

Two enormous traction engines are placed about 300 to 500 yards apart. Beneath each engine and bolted to the boiler is a steel drum about five feet in diameter. To these drums is attached a steel cable about three-quarters of an inch in diameter, 500 yards long, and capable sustaining a weight of thirty tons, which drags the plow to and fro across the field. The plow is a framework of iron resting upon two large wheels; on each side of this frame are firmly fixed six plows with coulters that cut six furrows sixteen inches wide each time the machine crosses the field. On the arrival of the plow at the end of the furrow the gage changes position, and the plows that have been in the air are lowered and ready to start back. One man is sufficient to guide the plow, and, seated over the body of the machine, directs one of the two large wheels in the furrow last turned, by means of a hand-wheel. Each engine is about forty-horse power, and weighs about sixteen tons. When the plow reaches one side of the field the engine on that side moves ahead eight feet, the operation taking three and one-half minutes only, and the plow is started back to the other side of the field. The plow will break from twenty-five to thirty-five acres per day, according to the soil, location, and lay of the land, etc. It also does harrowing.

DEEP PLOWING: USEFUL AND INJURIOUS.

Mr. Orange Judd discusses the subject of plowing in the American Agriculturist for April, and among other things says the following:

The sun's warmth greatly assists the preparation of the food material collected by the leaves, adapting it for plant nourishment. We speak of warm "growing weather." But while the hot sun rapidly increases the preparation of plant food, it dries off the sap faster from the leaves, and also the moisture from the surface soil, so that the roots can not get a full supply. In both these ways the sap —the life blood of the plant—is diminished, and for want of this the food distribution or growth is lessened, and frequently is stopped altogether. The leaves curl, the plants droop, often dying out after a few hot days. This is especially the case on shallow soils, and on prairie land which, by reason of its dark color, absorbs more of the sun's heat than those of lighter color. Owing to the loose texture of such soils they bring up moisture from below much less rapidly than fine, compact loams and clays.

Is it not plain then, that if a soil is plowed deep and made fine, so that the air will penetrate deeply, and the plant roots be thus invited well below the surface, out of the sun's reach even in a drouth, which seldom dries to more than two to four inches deep, the plants having such roots will be always supplied with the needed sap, and the growth will proceed rapidly even in the dryest days. Hence, as a rule, deep plowing and working of the soil are highly advantageous.

But not always. The porous prairie soils are usually in fair condition a foot deep or more; the air has circulated through them, destroying deleterious acids, poisonous salts, etc. On heavier soils, so compact that the air has never circulated below the immediate surface, the subsoil may be actually filled with poisonous substances. We know that earth brought up in digging wells and deep ditches will seldom support vegetable life, for a year or two at least. To run a plow down into such a soil three or four inches below the previously stirred surface, and turn up a heavy layer of it, may actually kill the first crop sown or planted.

The right way, with such soils, is to go down an inch or two annually, and bring up a little new soil each time, but not enough to materially harm the growing crops. In this way we may in time secure a healthful, porous, areated, deep plant bed, that will furnish abundant moisture in the hottest season, besides providing new supplies of inorganic food needed for the best growth of crops.

TO OUR RURAL SUBSCRIBERS.

Do you want the lodge system shown up in your neighborhood in its true inwardness? It will cost you but a trifle for Weed pamphlets enough to put one in every family in your village. It shows the "craft at work" in our courts, in politics, and everywhere that power is of any importance. It's a strong and unswerable assault upon the lodge, and where you cannot afford the expense of lectures or degree work, this is the next best thing for you to do. Price, 12 for 50 cts.; 25 for $1.00; 100 for $3.00, and 1,000 for $20.00.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

TRIAL SUBSCRIBERS.

The few hundreds who have received and read the Cynosure on the four weeks Trial list, may safely reckon that the best is yet in reserve, and they should be careful not to miss a single number, by neglecting to forward their subscriptions for a year in time to avoid a break. Our back numbers have been so reduced by calls for specials that we can promise no back numbers, and you should be sure to keep the connection.

We are on the eve of a struggle which is to determine who shall rule and administer our government. Whether secret rings and cliques all centering in Freemasonry shall connive at the crimes of oath-bound confederates, or open courts with lawful oaths shall assure rights at all, on the plane of equality and law.

DR. JOHN BULL'S
Smith's Tonic Syrup
FEVER and AGUE
Or CHILLS and FEVER.
AND ALL MALARIAL DISEASES.

The proprietor of this celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE, CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. He refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to cure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and whole families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the general health. It is, however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medicine will not require any aid to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

The genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN J SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP, of Louisville, Ky. Examine well the label on each bottle. If my private stamp is not on each bottle do not purchase, or you will be deceived.

A THAD. STEVENS

number of the Cynosure we have for some time anticipated as one of the greatest value to our readers and the reform. And here it is! The editorial sketch will not lose in value or interest beside the eloquent and powerful arguments from Mr. Stevens himself, which hercin accompany his portrait.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

An organization which furnished a field for the development of a Dwight L. Moody ought to be of some importance in the community where it exists. So when on Sabbath afternoon the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Chicago Young Men's Christian Association was held in Farwell Hall, the great room was filled and the interest and animation of all the participants was strong and full. Upon the platform were all the twelve ex-presidents of the Association except Mr. Moody, and a brief address from each formed the main feature of the occasion. One of the number, Mr. John V. Farwell, who was for years God's agent in making good to Moody the promise to "add all these things" if he sought first Christ's kingdom and righteousness, and who in the infant years of the Association lifted it over more than one ditch of financial distress, referred to the great work of Mr. Moody in erecting a building for the Association. This, the Farwell Hall building, was dedicated in September, 1867; burned January, 1868; again dedicated January, 1869; again burned October 9, 1871; a third time dedicated, November 26, 1874; remodelled 1882. After passing through so many fires, we are reminded of the analogy of purification. Perhaps in every respect the Chicago Y. M. C. A. has not improved by its trials, but is has undoubtedly in years past brought many a blessing to this great city through its various agencies of daily prayer meetings, street meetings, tract distribution, etc. While perhaps its strictly religious work is not so proportionately prominent as when Mr. Moody was here ten years ago, it is yet doing a great work among the thousands of young men of the city.

Another consideration in the farmers' strike against the milkmen of New York is the Erie railway, which brings most of the milk from Orange county to the city at a rate claimed by the farmers as five times as great as that for the higher classes and fifteen times as great as the average rate for all classes of way freight. The ordinary freight-car earns $700 per annum while the milk car earns $26,000. The situation somewhat resembles the quarreling farmers who held the cow by horns and tail while the lawyer quietly milked his pail full. The railway company takes the place of the lawyer on one side and the city milk dealer on the other.

The celebration of the spring festival of the ritualistic churches has passed without so much notice on the part of the *upper ten*dom of lodgery as usual, albeit the Knight Templar chief of Illinois called upon the order to remember their opportunity. In Rochester, N. Y., the military Freemasons marched into one of the churches on the evening of Sabbath, Mar. 25th, and listened to a sermon, the like of which we hope was not elsewhere heard from a pulpit called Christian. The substance of the discourse was an exaltation of Middle Age chivalry as the essential feature of Christianity of that day, receiving from Christ its character and soul. This is a good Masonic gospel, but is about as appropriate for a Christian pulpit as the howling of a Mormon bishop.

This same festival has this year other peculiarities pertaining to its celebration. As an historical fact the anniversary of Christ's resurrection is this year the 29th of April. The elasticity of human invention provides for all disagreement, so that whether the 25th of March, or any intervening date is the time observed, every purpose is secured. Were this festivity founded in the truth none other than the true day would answer the end of its observance. On this point the Intelligeneer remarks: "The Protestant church should not run the risk of subjecting itself to ridicule by accepting the blundering arrangements of the papacy." But a misdate is not the worst of the matter when we come to settle with Him who has put into the Word a remonstrance with those who "observe days, and months, and times, and years," that they are coming into bondage to "weak and beggarly elements."

A letter on another page calls attention to one of the most celebrated cases that the courts of Indiana have yet recorded. It has now passed its tenth week and the lawyers only began to plead on Monday. The number of witnesses examined on both sides has been 260, enough surely to establish or destroy the character of the vilest or the purest, and possibly also to hopelessly confuse a jury. Mrs. Gougar is editor of Our Herald, a journal half temperance, half woman's suffrage. She also was an able advocate on the platform for prohibition, during the effort for constitutional prohibition last year. Her severity of argument and invective it is said enraged the opponents of that measure who were at a loss how to meet a woman in so severe a combat, and finally resorted to the basest slander. Captain W. D. Wallace is one of the contributors of Our Herald, and was also engaged in speaking for prohibition. It was over his shoulders that the enemies of both attempted to whip Mrs. Gougar, by a charge of adultery, in which both were criminal. Mrs. Gougar sued the editor of a Lafayette paper in which the slanders were published. The lawyers of the defense have been allowed the greatest liberty by the court and have used it with satanic malignity in their effort to destroy the character of a brave woman. They have been driven from one point to another and have left but a narrow margin of hope for their case. How much the lodge has to do in the case cannot at present probably be known, but there is one very important fact in this connection whose significance we do not undervalue. Judge Croffuth, one of the lawyers of the defense, who is bitterly pressing the case, was engaged to prosecute Perdue University a year or more ago in the interests of the lodge. Opposed to him was the same Captain Wallace who is under the slanderous charges with Mrs. Gougar. By eloquence and a masterly presentation of his case, Wallace was triumphant, and it is more than intimated that chargin, envy and hate of a rival have spurred Croffuth on in the present trial.

Judge Phelps, the new criminal magistrate of Baltimore, has already acquired the nick-name of "Judge Terror." He holds court day and night, and imposes the heaviest sentences which the law allows. For selling liquor on Sunday a luckless restaurant-keeper last week had his license revoked, and fined $50 and costs, and was sent to jail for ten days.

HONOR IN THE CRAFT.

In the Life of Brant, by Wm. L. Stone, we are informed that at the battle of Minnisink, in 1779, one Major Wood saved his life by means which Brant considered dishonorable. By some means or other, Wood, though not a Freemason, had acquired a knowledge of the Master Mason's grand hailing sign of distress; and having been informed that Brant was a member of the brotherhood, he gave the sign. Faithful to his oath, the savage chieftain interposed, and saved Wood's life. Discovering the imposture afterward, Brant was very indignant. But the account says that Wood, considering himself bound in honor to do so, became a Freemason, and said that he always felt mortified at the deception he had practiced, and that nothing could have been more withering than the scorn with which Brant ever looked upon him.

The historian and his heroes, in this case were all Masons, and their ideas of honor and dishonor are quite Masonic. The important thing in the transaction was, not that Wood saved his life, but that he did it in a dishonorable way—a way on which the saved man afterward looked with mortification, and his intended slayer with indignation. It would seem to have been worse than not to have been saved at all, causing the Major's bosom to heave with remorse, like unto that which filled the breasts of Jubela, Jubelo and Jubelum for playing ruffian with Hiram. We seem to hear him bemoaning himself thus: "O that the Indian hatchet had sunk into my temples, and and my scalp had been torn from my crown, ere I had done so base a thing as to save my life by a signal made only for the use of the initiated." After his initiation, at least, he learned to respect Masonry's claim to a monopoly of the means of saving life, as well as of getting all the offices. Before this, he had simply desired, for the occasion, to become as a Mason to a Mason, that he might by any means save his life; after this he learned that if any man in war would save his life at all, it must be by the cable tow and the grand signal.

A curious thing is the Masonic idea of honor and dishonor. It is honorable to kill a prisoner of war, but dishonorable for the prisoner to save himself except in a Masonic way, and not then unless the prisoner be of the sworn fraternity. Honorable to take and keep a barbarous and revengeful oath; dishonorable to emancipate oneself from its restraints. Honorable to keep a secret regarding a fellow member of the lodge, though he has committed arson, murder or treason; dishonorable to testify of his crime, though the civil law require it, and the public interest demand it. Honorable to do any dirty trick in school; dishonorable to tell a tale about it out of school. Honorable to plot against the life, liberty and interests of an enemy, not of the craft; dishonorable to touch a hair of the head of one of the sworn brotherhood, or injure in property or reputation a fellow conspirator. Dishonorable to violate the chastity of a brother Mason s wife; but the law of chastity as regards other men's wives a matter of indifference. Evidently the Masonic law of honor is not in harmouy with the divine; it is not the broad and kindly spirit called honorable among good men. G. W. H.

RELIGION OF MASONRY.

That slave Masonry, erroneously termed free—claims great antiquity we shall not dispute or attempt denial; rather affirm such to be the fact; and thus yield to its advocates, dupes and disciples whatever of strength they may derive from continuous boasting of its long standing. It will be of its vociferous and loud proclamations of good standing aud beneficial results claimed and harped upon, that we propose to deal.

We have been taught that it is the Spirit that maketh free Now, "if any man hath the Spirit of Christ then is he free indeed!" Per contra: if all be wounds, bruises and putrifying sores, from the crown of the head to the soles of the feet, why there is no soundness in us. If in addition we be bound, wound, cable-towed, blindfolded, beat, bludgeoned, billied, banged, thumped, whacked, kicked, cuffed, jerked, pulled, pushed, dragged, stabbed in body and reputation; ruined physically and financially—then it would appear patent to the most obtuse or indifferent, that such an one is not in the enjoyment of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness; that he cannot boast of any great amount of freedom; is in a worse condition than even the African slave. Being thus shorn of the just rights and privileges to which he was born, and such as the great Creator designed him to enjoy: not in condition to call his soul his own (having mortgaged it to Satan) we submit it, as a logical conclusion, that he has no claim whatever to the term "Free-mason," or free man, either.

It is repeated: being hood-winked, foresworn (contrary to the express command of God) and bound by the most horrible, outrageous and outlandish oaths and inhuman penalties, what right has he to be called FREE? None whatever. He has been more stupid than Esau. The latter got a mess of pottage when he was very hungry. But the Masouic dupe must give himself away, and on a full belly too. Then, we insist he should ccase croaking of that he does not possess. He should be branded as a liar, and not entitled to the coufidence of civilized or Christian men. He is a slave all over, and we submit it to all fair-minded men, whether slave Mason, be not the more truthful term and appropriate handle by which to term him.

This same crafty institution has much to say of the great age it has been suffered to exist. One hundred and sixty years, or thereabouts, of sin and wickedness we admit is a long time for the world to sûffer the affliction, but, as an argument of merit, it proves nothing—only about three times as old as Mormonism, its offspring and auxiliary. In 1717, is the first heard of organized speculative Freemasonry, so-called, and the Apple-tree tavern or chebang, London, the birthplace of this devilish blight to the human race.

Poor mother Eve went for the apple, and her bacchanalian descendants cling to apple-jack. This may also have something to do with, and possibly account for, the cognomen, Jack Mason, as understood to apply to the strange figure sometimes found existing between the two, but too cowardly to decide which—slave or free. He is really not one thing or the other in speech; but in sympathy with the slave Mason, as in his conscience the more consistent.

That the germs and principle of this peculiar organization existed at a date long prior to the London lodge, all will admit in the evidence afforded by the great exploit of Grand Master Cain. It seems that he too gloried in this same kind of religion, and very zealously endeavored to "live up to it" in the murder of his brother Abel. He no doubt had but lately been initiated—taken but one degree, which instructed him in the noble art of lying; for upon the demand of the Almighty as to where his brother Abel was, he lied like a—like a—Slave Mason exactly, when he said he didn't know! "I'm not my brother's keeper and don't wish to be interviewed. Just let me alone!" and so they all cry. Well, what else could he say? His Satanic Majesty, the great puissant, had him—bound hand and foot, nothing loose about him but his tongue, and that taught to wag out lies, or be torn out by the roots. Pray what could he do more than try to prove himself a worthy knight and (honorable!) member of the craft (his church)? So he did it, and continues in good standing to-day, in this ancient order!

We have another example of slave Masonry religion, tolerably well lived up to, in Jacob's family. You remember one day when the older boys got out of sight of the house, and beyond the vision of their father, they thought they must do something smart, and show off a little Masonic brightness; they must convene a secret lodge; and barely had they time to fix on a password,

> When on the ground in Oriental or Turkish style they sat,
> Discussing, to aggrandize themselves at expense of others and all that;
> Looking up, beheld a lad, coming o'er the hills and through the heather,
> And, as he drew near, were ready to slay their younger brother!

This crime, so revolting to humanity and outside cowans (who they insist know nothing about it), and so everlastingly barbarous and disgraceful, was yet in perfect harmouy with the doctrines of the craft, and in general keeping with their religious practice, shows too, what prudence and care was used in approaching their victim that came that way. Ten to one in an assault seems a safe percentage, and such was and is about the rule that assures safety to themselves. These big brothers lacked the courage of their illustrious predecessor, Cain; having no scruples of honor conscience or of manly impulse in their dastardly assault on their inoffensive boy brother. Their religious zeal impelled them; must be lived up to, and—Joseph must die and they must lie—Masonically, of course! Yet little brother Joe, cowan and dreamer as he was, in God's providence proved more than a match for the combined power of Satan, and nicely turned the table on the wicked ring. And the way he sacked them was a caution—to them and their posterity, down to the present day. He not only filled their sacks with corn, but conveyed to them in broad hints that "man was not to live by bread alone, but by every word that proceeded out of the mouth of God."

The reader, whether slave Mason (free Mason if there be such,) or Anti-mason, would lose nothing in re-perusing this graphic account of this wicked affair as detailed in the sacred volume, in a style of pathetic beauty and eloquence that throws the Byrons and Beechers, Shakespears and Ingersolls, quite into the shade.

Again: at the crucifixion of our Lord and Saviour the cowardly conclave have just emerged from secret session, whereat "Hail Master" was agreed on as the "password," and "a kiss" the sign, by which the Lord of glory was to be delivered into their religious or rather sacriligious hands. And, just look at the tremendous pile of cash! Then, behold the sacrifice! ! Thirty pieces of silver, at the expense of the life (as they counted) of the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world!" How the poor blind, but wicked lodgites supposed their triumph complete. They certainly believed that now their religion would forever be secure and undisturbed. They had forgotten that but a short time previous they were told by this same Jesus whom they had crucified, that "these things must be, that the Scriptures might be fulfilled;" "that the Son of man (God) had power to lay down his life and power to take it again." Now, it may require less power to lay down a life thau to take it again. Many may lay down their lives. Grand Master Hiram might permit himself, (but no sensible person, bond or free, believes it) to be knocked down, but it took the tremendous grip of the lion's paw to scratch him up again. Besides he was a worthless (instead of worthy) body, when up. But the whole united blasphemous crew of the Ku Klux Klan, could sham a resurrection of a mythical widow's son, for no earthly use or purpose than the propagation and perpetuation of his Satanic majesty's religion, as exemplified in these and similar ridiculous and outrageous humbuggeries, whereby the craft get their living; the rest of mankind are swindled, wronged, outraged and oppressed; and the devil's kingdom extended. Yes, a simple, foolish, weak-minded man may lay down his life—commit suicide, or worse, attach himself to slave Masonry—but you never heard of his taking it up again. It takes a God for that! A crucified and blessed Redeemer could and did do it—did accomplish for the benefit of fallen, sinful man—even a slave Mason, if he repents.

In the throes of death, in the agony of (apparent) despair, the great work the Father gave him to do, was declared FINISHED, and life and immortality brought to light! And now, sitting on the right hand of the Father he maketh intercession for us, sinners. For has he not told us that, "whoso confesseth and forsaketh the evil of his way, the same shall find mercy." Glorious promise! The religion, and the only safe one to live and die by; the only Master, too, that we feel called on to reverence, serve and acknowledge. But it is hardly enough to renounce slave Masonry, and other sins, but we should denounce also, in all their ramifications and conditions.

Slave Masonry professes to be a religion; but we think so much after the manner of self-righteousness, that it is but little profit to live by, even though it be let alone, and worth just nothing at all to die by. Yet, how surprising! its votaries still insist on being let alone—"good religion as they want if lived up to," etc. How forcibly this brings up the sublime truth, as uttered by the Saviour near two thousand years ago: "As your fathers did so do ye." And these Masons, slave or free, all lie after the manner and under the instruction of the devil, and may continue to do so, until ("he that letteth will let, till) the man of sin be done away." D. GREAT CONFLICTS.

Every one sees before his miud's eye great conflicts whenever such names as Cæsar and Hannibal, Wellington and Napoleon, or our own Washingtou and Grant are named. There are also great conflicts of a moral nature which change the standards of human duty or those of the faith and religion of nations. Such changes may come from violent convulsions like earthquakes, as Luther in Germany or Knox in Scotland, or they may be gradual as the rising and setting sun—involving light and darkness, progress or retrogression, as in Geneva or in New England, or Palestine itself. When our Lord said his hearers could discern the face of the sky, he reproached them for not also discerning the signs of the times. Now, Americans can see how their great war might have been avoided, but even at its very threshold our intelligent statesmen talked of it as but a three months trouble. They did not then read aright "the signs of the times!"

What are the sigus now on our national horizon? What are the leading principles controlling our legislation? What the sentiments which shall sway our people? To ask these questions raises a cloud on intelligent Christian minds. But how to bring about the changes most desirable, and so to prevent injurious results, becomes the anxious question of the hour. Lincoln, the martyr President, for the change of our colored millious from slavery to freedom; Garfield the second martyr for a cause not yet so easily defined, startled the nation and the whole world. What! the most enlightened and Christian republic the world had ever seen, repeating the barbarous practices of the most ignorant ages of despotism! Murders committed where the people could change their President every four years! What can be said of the startling facts? Is our civilization a mockery? Is our Christianity a failure? or have we now but the suction of the retreating wave of progress? Are we at the mercy of uncontrollable forces destructive to our prospects, or do we ride on the flood tide of unquestionable advancement?

"The schoolmaster is abroad," and he is doubtless a blessing to the nations. Freedom has been advancing and "slaves cannot (now) breathe" in the United States any more than "in England." The world has been advancing, but what is this retrograde action, and what these questionings of the free and open expression of right against wrong? Why these whisperings! whence these serpent-like hissings, and that love of the deceitful, glittering eyes which so charm the many admirers? Too much liberty, eh? Is the great light of modern advancement too bright for eyes so long in darkness? Such, verily, seems to be the case.

There have ever beeu traitors to every good cause. Christianity had its Judas and our Republic had its Arnold. The traitor's face is found in every movement that is made for the benefit of mankind. The Divine order for human well-being requires man to be a co worker therein to secure its blessings, but conceited man tries to iuterpose his own wisdom or seeks a substitute in the suggestions of his Edenic enemy.

Liberty! Christianity! Happy pair! Our Christianity freely invites all to her teachings and freely coufers her blessiugs on every one who is willing to accept them. She teaches aud practices every best thing for the benefit of Jew and Gentile, pagan and Christian, the world over, openly and freely. But the great deceiver robes himself as an angel of light and gently persuades men to disobedience by the small word not—"thou shalt not surely die." "Let your light shine before meu," saith Christianity. Let your light shine only in your lodges, saith lodgery. Hide our best things in the secret chambers, says secrecy. Christianity is to be proclaimed to the whole world. Nay, says Satan, first "fall down and worship me and thou shalt have the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them."

And there are thousands in our country who have had both freedom and Bibles, but who have listened to the seducer and surrendered both. They have rushed into the dark door of lodgery—thrust out their tongue to taste its sweets—and have had it so bound and tied that henceforth both their liberty and their Christianity are strangled, and they have emerged upon society not as citizens—not as Christians—but as oath-bound, duped slaves to a dark despotism of a mixed and corrupted heathenism and Romanism, whose excellence they are bound to maintain over every other religion, and whose oaths compel obedience, even to the violation of the primary duties in the family, in the state, and in the church.

Yes, before the great change takes place in public sentiment against this deceiver we can scarcely hope that there shall be no martyrs. The hanging of John Brown nerved many a soldier's arm and gave him endurance on the march. Morgan's monument is the first, but may not be the last awarded to martyrs for this war against the secret despotism over our people. Christians, fellowship not such works of darkness. They are enemies and subverters of our religion and our liberty. Citizens, vote only for such candidates as condemn lodgery and are loyal to liberty.

THE RELIGION OF THE DAY.

Many evils grow big and strong in the church because those who see them lack the courage and honesty to oppose them with vigor. In time these evils become so strongly entrenched that opposition to them in the church is unavailing.

This is the position of many of the churches in respect to Masonic preachers. Many in these churches believe that Masonry is wrong. All might easily know that it is an anti-Christian religion. Yet it has been tolerated until the popular Christianity of the times is largely molded by it.

The Christianity of the New Testament is supernatural. In its very beginning it requires a supernatural change of the heart wrought by the direct agency of the Holy Spirit. Men grow in grace, not so much by the discharge of their duties, as by the inward renewing of the Spirit from day to day. Their duties are performed from Christian motives. If they preach, they do it for God, at his call. They proclaim his truth faithfully. If they give their money, it is because God has a claim upon it. The love of Christ constrains them, and this is the most powerful motive which can be addressed to them.

The religion of the day is, to a great extent, a natural religion. People are converted to it very much as they are converted to a political party. If they are amiable and moral little or no change is expected. The religious duties required of them are such as any ordinary person can perform. Preachers enter the ministry as a profession by which they can obtain a respectable living. Men give the money to support the popular religion in order to gain patronage in their business, or to get a reputation, or because they are not willing to be outdone by others. Often appeals are made to even baser motives, and the pocket is reached through the appetites. The church is transformed into a play-house on a week-day, and into a bazaar of fashion on the Sabbath.

If you see these evils it is a solemn duty which you owe to God and to the people to give it no countenance or support. If a Masonic preacher is sent to your church, do not give him your money; and do not even go to hear him preach. The word of God is very plain upon this point: "But though we or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed." Gal. 1:8. "Whosoever transgresseth, and abideth not in the doctrine of Christ, hath not God." "If there come any unto you, and bring not this doctrine, receive him not into your house, neither bid him God speed. For he that biddeth him God speed is partaker of his evil deeds." 2 John 9: 11.—Earnest Christian.

QUESTIONS IN MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

CASE.

Two great soulless, unmoral parties claim the government of a Christian people. One of them has sinned against man by enslaving four millions of human beings, and the other has sinned against God by initiating two millions of voters into the lodge.

Now the question is: First. Is it morally right for Christian to vote for either of these two parties?

Second. Has a Christian a moral right to choose the least of two or more evils, instead of demanding always the greatest of two or more goods?

Third. Has a Christian a moral right to refrain from cutting off his right hand, plucking out his right eye, or throwing away his vote if it leads to evil?

Fourth. Has a Christian the moral right to follow a multitude of voters to sustain slavery or to keep up the infidel villainies of the Masonic lodge?

THADDEUS STEVENS.

SPEECHES UPON QUESTIONS ARISING FROM THE INVESTIGATION OF FREE-MASONRY.

[The record of the great National Anti-masonic Convention of 1830, held in Philadelphia, and attended by such men as Thaddeus Stevens, Wm. H. Seward, Myron Holly, Amasa Walker, Pliny Merriek, Frederiek Whittlesey, Joseph Ritner, Wm. Slade and others, contains several speeches by "the Great Commoner," as Mr. Stevens was afterward familiarly called. The following selections show admirably the fearlessness and integrity of his character, the keenness of his logic and the force of his eloquence. These addresses are found in print only, we believe, in very rare copies of the report of this convention.]

ON THE MASONIC INFLUENCE UPON THE PRESS.

It is known to some of the citizens of these United States,—a portion, and a large portion of our freemen have heard it rumored,—that there does exist in their midst, an institution whose secrets are operating upon the welfare of the community, in plotting those things which are not consistent with the liberty of these States. Those freemen have delegated a portion of their citizens under the protection of the law, to meet in solemn council, for the high purpose of investigating, whether, in this free land, there do really exist secret treasons;—whether, as they have been induced to believe, there do exist secret combinations of men, whose constitution, comprised in their oaths, is inconsistent with permanent and rational liberty. It was known that these men thus delegated were to meet in the city of Philadelphia to make this important investigation. It is important to those who are accused; it is important to the many millions of freemen, who are told that such institutions do exist, that a fair, and full, and open inquiry be had in the face of day—that the inquiry should come to the ear of a fair and impartial judge—to the people, that they may investigate the truth for themselves. And if there be falsehood, if no such institutions exist, if those who have made the allegation before the tribunal of the public, have attempted to impose falsehood for truth, and perjury for honest testimony, it is necessary that it should be known in order that the accused may be exculpated, and that infamy may cover those, who have thus improperly agitated the public mind. If true, it is right that this great community should know it, and guard against the evil.

Look at the operation of the press—and I ask you, every man who hears me, what proportion of the people of these United States, know that such a convention has this day assembled? There is scarcely a man in the South who knows it, for the papers have never mentioned it. I will venture to affirm, that not one-fourth part of the citizens of this intelligent city, in which this convention was to assemble, not one-fourth of the citizens of this place, even to the present moment, know that you were to meet here, or that you are now in session.

Look at the public papers in the city of Philadelphia—and many are printed and circulated; for it is a city of intelligence, and their papers are conducted with ability, spirit and power; and if there were not an influence operating, higher than human curiosity, and higher than is known to the laws of our land, would they not have given a knowledge of the facts, of such a convention being about to assemble, especially when such charges are alleged against respectable men, high in power. And why is it so? Look at the daily papers of this city, and where will you find one that has announced the simple fact—I make one honorable exception; for I know that the fact was announced by one paper in this city, not claiming to be Anti-masonic.

But, sir, I ask, when, in a populous city, embracing hundreds of thousands of souls—when did such a convention ever meet, to deliberate for a nation's safety, that the public journals, seeking the promotion of their own interests, did not give their proceedings from day to day, and inform the public, whether they are proceeding right or wrong; and if wrong direct the attention of the community to them, and fix the gaze of the public upon them. With one honorable exception—except in the case of a paper established upon Anti-masonic grounds, there is not one, of the whole of this worthy corps, that appears to know that you exist; not one that has the desire or curiosity to see you, or a wish, that those whom he is to enlighten, should know whether this body are entitled to respect and credit, for the important disclosures which they are about to make. But we profess to have in hand matter, whether true or false, which the public are entitled to know. And yet the papers which surround you are as silent as the grave.

These are facts, to show, that at least this discussion is not improper; that at least a discussion of this kind is almost the only means of communicating the facts regarding an institution which we deem dangerous. I know that the public presses on the other side, now and then, instead of giving the facts, brand the efforts of Anti-masonry with infamy. And I am sorry to say, that this practice is not confined to members of the fraternity who govern the press. I recollect, and lately witnessed it, in an address delivered before a Masonic assemblage in the western part of this State, and now published in the Masonic papers, where a learned judge descended from his high station, to make a charge upon those who had favored the Anti-masonic cause, in words like these, "They pretend that the secrets of Freemasonry are before the community, but for themselves they are entitled to no credit, for it is the fashion of the day in the party to which they belong, to be associated with infamy, and they deserve not to be publicly credited." This reminds me of another learned judge from the same city, who upon a late occasion declined to stand as a candidate for Congress. He used language not less disrespectful. If any thing is calculated to cast discredit upon the fraternity, not a word of it is found in their papers. I know the cause; the reasons have been given why they muzzle the press. They are, that charges are made against the whole fraternity, for holding principles which sanction the execution of William Morgan. But let the people say whether in fact they do not sanction such principles. Till the Masonic fraternity do disapprove of the act, and pronounce it unmasonic conduct; till they inflict Masonic punishment on the malefactors, it is right that the imputation should be repeated before the people. And I hope that all the people will hear, and, more and more hear, that melancholy tragedy recited, till it awake them to examination. I am unwilling to injure the feelings of Masons in any part of the country, but while they sanction that act, I would place before them the ghost of that murdered martyr, in his bloody garments, though it should sear their eye-balls.

CAN WE BELIEVE THE DISCLOSURES OF THE LODGE.

What then, sir, is the question which we are called on to decide? An institution which exteuds over the civilized world, embracing men of every rank, both in office and out of office—those of high intellectual endowments, and apparently of fair character—this institution is accused before the tribunal of the people of this country, of being bound together, by the constitution which is developed in Elder Bernard's revelations of Freemasonry. Now I admit that this charge is a high and an important one—one that deeply implicates the institution—and I am candid enough to say that it deeply implicates the integrity, honesty, and moral feeling of men high in life, high in the estimation of the people; and those whom I have been taught to respect—those whom I should be sorry to believe thus implicated; and unless impelled to the irresistible conclusion, that they are thus bound together, let us reject this report, nor cast upon these men the imputations which it contains.

Now, what are the rules of evidence, with regard to the decision, which ought to follow from the testimony? When high crimes and misdemeanors are charged upon an institution—and in the further discussion, I will consider the institution, and not individuals, as placed on trial—when high crimes are charged upon an institution or an individual, I admit, sir, that slight evidence, rumor, suspicion, suspected testimony or contradictory evidence, should not be sufficient to award a verdict of guilty. For unless the testimouy is so clear as to remove from the mind of all who try the case every shadow of reasonable doubt, however strongly we may suspect, let us not solemnly condemn—let us pause upon these principles, let us examine the testimony now before the convention and the public, and from which last tribunal, upon this earth, there is no appeal.

In the first place there is direct testimony—and all testimony is of two kinds, circumstantial or positive,—either of which, if clear, is sufficient to condemn—we have the direct testimony of witnesses who are themselves seceding Masons, to the number of about a dozen, who are now in this convention, and who testify directly to the truth of these revelations; and the public have the testimony of from five hundred to some thousands throughout the Union, who testify to the same fact.

Now, this testimony, if unimpeached, either from contradictory testimony, or the nature of their own evidence, would be sufficient, in all human judgment, to make out the case in favor of condemnation; for by the mouth of two or three witnesses (that is uncontradicted, I take it for granted) every thing is established.

I admit, and I propose to treat them with candor, I admit that there are objections made to this direct evidence, which at first blush strike the mind of the public, and of those who investigate, as being hard to get over. The objections are contained in the nature of the testimony itself, and this arises from the intrinsic facts which they disclose.

In the first place, the fraternity allege that the witnesses are participes criminis—that the parties in this transaction are involved in the guilt of this institution, and that, therefore, they are to be viewed with suspicion—they say, that from the nature of their disclosures, they show that they are willing to commit perjury; because the fact of making the disclosures is a violation of what they admit to be a solemn oath. Here, therefore, and in order that I may not misrepresent the position thus taken, I beg leave to read from a paper the argument, not of men who have argued this case in the bar-room, or of illiterate men who have not judicial rules, but the reasoning of a learned judge, who now sits upon the bench—who is presumed to be, and in fact is, a learned man, the honorable Charles Shaler, of the western district of Pennsylvania—in the following words: "It is, however, alleged that Masons are false pretenders to virtues that thy never exercise; and that the disclosures of certain members of the fraternity evince a set of principles at war with the duties that every citizen owes to his country and government. It is hardly now necessary to inquire what share of confidence is to be given to those who, in making disclosures, admit that they are ready to break through every obligation of honor, and every moral sanction, for the purpose of attaining their object. It is the fashion of the times to confide in the faithless, and do abundant honor to him who breaks through those restraints that were once held sacred by the community. It is the peculiar felicity of our opponents that they mark their companionship with infamy, and deduce their claims to confidence from the dregs of corruption and depths of prostitution." Here, sir, and I treat it respectfully—here is the argument on the part of the defense for impeaching all the direct testimony which can be brought to bear against this institution.

If his honor has learned his rules from any system of morality, it must be such as is sanctioned in a den of mid-

*Let us now analyse it for a moment, and see how far it is correct. The learned judge says, they admit, that in making the disclosures they are ready to break through every obligation of honor and every moral sanction. Here, in the first place, is a false assumption in point of argument and fact. These witnesses do not admit that they violate the rules of honor or morality in breaking their obligations. Let us look at their oaths and see if they admit it. Those oaths, if true, disclose a scene of iniquity which no one can vindicate. Admitting that his honor had taken such an oath as those disclosed, would he be bound in morality to keep it? If not, then they do not admit that they violate any moral obligations by their disclosures. Where did the judge learn his rules of honor and morals? Did he learn them in books of ethics; from writers on moral philosophy; or from the Bible? As a jurist, he knows that no man is bound by an extra-judicial oath—as a moralist, he ought to know that no man is bound by an oath which conflicts with the laws of his country. A dishonorable oath has no binding force with honorable minds.

If his honor has learned his rules from any system of morality, it must be such as is sanctioned in a den of midnight robbers, where, to conceal their guilt, they deem it necessary to preserve secresy through unhallowed obligations. If he has imbibed them in any school of honor, he must have learned them there; and there is no honor which is forfeited by such disclosures, unless it be that honor which is said to exist among thieves. Thus we see that seceding Masons did not violate any rules of honor or morals, when they published the secrets of Freemasonry to the world. And there is nothing in the nature of the disclosures themselves to impeach their motives as to what they admit by their disclosures. Then the judge assumed a mistake in his argument, when he said, they admit that they have violated these rules. There appears to be more force in the other clause of the objection.

These witnesses were at one time partakers in the crimes of the institution, and they have now come forward and borne testimony against it. Now I hold, that whenever (independent of the oaths), the parties have been associated in iniquity, a disclosure of that iniquity by one or two men under circumstances which cause a suspicion of their motives, unless corroborating circumstances go to strengthen their testimony and put it beyond doubt, such evidence ought to be received with caution and weighed with some scruples of allowance.

I will give them the full benefit of this rule. I would consider the institution on trial before the tribunal of the public for life and death—all the sympathies of our nature exercised in its favor; and still, unless our judgment fail us, sufficient testimony exists to produce conviction. Then, admitting that there is some shadow of doubt upon all the testimony of seceders, however high their character might have been before, let us see how it is corroborated. If coming from the mouth of one or two witnesses only, it would be doubted; if coming from Morgan only, it would be laughed down, and that would be an end of it. Not one in a million would have believed it, if confined to that book; but if two or three witnesses only confirmed it, it would justly have some weight; but when you find a host of hundreds of witnesses, coming forward to corroborate each other, in different sections of the country, with regard to these institutions, so complicated and varied in their penalties, and all such witnesses agreeing with each other, who can fail to believe? But it is said, the character of these men is not good; for we have heard it asserted, and it is so asserted, before the bar of the people.

I have no doubt, that among seceding Masons, where they have increased to a great number, as in all classes, there are some whose character is not the first in society. But when did the great mass, the great number of these witnesses acquire their bad character? When investigating a case of this kind, it is necessary to enquire how, and when, and by whom, this was brought about, and whether it has been got up within these few months past. These men, up to the date of their secession, it is not pretended, were bad characters. But we have a right to inquire, up to that time only. Then they were the honored members of the institution of a virtuous fraternity, according to the accused's own statement. Up to the time when they first gave evidence, the Masons cannot impeach their credit, because the whole fraternity endorsed their character, and the whole fraternity were responsible for their integrity, up to the date of such secession. No Mason dare say, in a Mason's face, that these men were not creditable up to that time. Then their character is sustained, by Masons themselves, up to the time of their testifying; and it is unimportant what their characters may have become since, or by whom blackened.

What are the circumstances now which corroborate these tainted witnesses? (to use Masonic language).

They set forth, that the members of the institution are bound together, by oaths, to secrecy, under the most horrid penalties, presenting death in all its most appalling forms; nothing short of death; there is no grade, all are alike, and all directed to the disclosures. How does this corroborate the direct evidence? In this way—in that secrecy—secrecy is the great boast and distinguishing characteristic of the institution, whether good or bad. It is that which has fixed the public attention upon it heretofore, more than any other known quality or attribute of the institution. One of their most learned lecturers, Mr. Brainard, who delivered a lecture in 1825, states, "That secrecy is a virtue, that it was taught in the lodges as a virtue, and taught effectually. Is it not so? Is not Masonic secrecy acknowledged as a mysterious thing? The most tattling man keeps this one thing—expel him, and he never tells this one thing—mad, drunk, or crazy, he never tells—does he talk in his sleep? it is not about Masonry. Bribe him in his wants—tempt him in his pleasures, but he never tells."

Secrecy is one of the boasted characterastics and virtues taught in the institution. But how is it, that the nature of man is thus changed? Take men as they are formed, and communicate a secret—and telling them not to disclose it, only creates an itching to tell it to the next neighbor, under a like injunction. If a secret be entrusted to a large number of men, even though the disclosure is punishable with death in its ordinary shape, let it be circulated among a great number of men, and there never was a case, but of the lodge, in which it was not disclosed. The common means of enforcing secrecy, is not sufficient; while in this case, the very disclosures show the most effectual teaching of secrecy, that human ingenuity and human power could invent; for it is not to be punished trivially, but with death. And this corroborates the very fact of the nature of their secrecy, and shows that the testimony which they have given, goes to tally with their conduct in this institution.

But what further do these disclosures go to show? They go to show that it is a part of the duty of Masons to aid each other in their business, and power, and in exalting them to high places.

I will not travel out of the record, but treat it fairly. What is Masonry now? "It comprises men of rank, wealth, office, and talent, in power and out of power, and that in almost every place where power is of importance; and it comprises, among other classes of the community, to the lowest, in large numbers, effective men, united together, and capable of being directed by the efforts of others, so as to have the force of concert through the civilized world." So says their orator Brainard.

And are there no circumstances, independent of these, to corroborate? Look around; though but one hundred thousand of the people of these United States are Freemasons, yet almost all the offices of high profit and high honor are filled with gentlemen of that institution. Out of the number of law judges in the State of Pennsylvania, eighteen-twentieths are Masons; and twenty two out of twenty-four States of the Union, are now governed by Masonic chief magistrates. Although not a twentieth part of the voters of this commonwealth, and of the United States, are Masons, yet they have contrived, by concert, to put themselves into eighteen out of twenty of the offices of profit and power. I defy contradiction to this statement.

When this is so, is it because the uninitiated are not fit for office; or is it because those principles which have been disclosed are secretly acted upon? And if the latter, is it not a strange corroboration of the direct testimony of seceding Masons?

Now, what is the consequence regularly deduced from this statement of facts and arguments? I say that every man who had arrived at the higher degrees of Masonry, and who perfectly understood the principles, and approved of them, and adhered to them at the time of Morgan's execution—I say, all those of the higher degrees, were accomplices before the fact, in the Masonic execution of William Morgan. I am satisfied that most Masons knew nothing about the principles of the institution; that they knew nothing of the ultimate designs and vile principles held by the leaders of the order. Therefore that number would not be implicated. But I am sorry that it falls to the lot of man to believe—and, sir, I am sorry for the sake of those whom I respect, that it is a necessary consequence, from the proof embraced in this report—that all those who knew the principles and adhered to them, at that time, were implicated as accessaries before the fact.

I go further, and say, that all, since that time, who adhere to the institution, and knowing its principles, attempt to sustain it—we must say and believe, are accessaries, after the fact, in that bloody deed.

What are the further consequences? If these disclosures are true, and men that we have been accustomed to listen to, as the oracles of God; who have been accustomed from day to day, and from year to year, to assemble around the table of the Lord, cannot be considered, if they adhere to this institution, and uphold it, fit subjects for the communion, and for office; for if these disclosures are true, if such things are done in the lodge, as the horrid scenes of pretending to kneel at the sepulchre of our Saviour, raising him from the grave, and pointing him out as ascending to the heavens; speaking from the burning bush, and representing, in mortal shape, the character and voice of that God, whose voice made the mountains tremble; if these acts exist, as the evidence shows, in my estimation they are more presumptuous than anything which a Christian could endure. Pagans would blush at them, and consign such men to shame for ever. Slight and trivial, compared with such heaven-braving acts, was the daring blasphemy, which fixed the eternal vulture on the living vitals of the pagan malefactor.

Can it be that this people, and this community, will not examine, will not call out with one unanimous inquiry, whether these things are so? Let them hold out the hand of fellowship to all those who will repent, and return; and exclude with a sorrowful, but determined force, from all places of power, those who still belong to the institution; and put them out from all communion with the holy and the good.

* Correction.—The last two lines on page 3 are out of place.

—In June, 1830, Thaddeus Stevens, then a member of the Pennsylvania legislature, made a report to that body from a committee to which was referred the petitions of numerous citizens of the State praying for an investigation into the evils of secret societies. The report shows that strict inquiry was made by the committee upon every point possible, and their report, based upon the facts established, utterly condemns the lodge. This report was in part published in the Cynosure of August 3, 1876.

New England.

THE NEW ENGLAND BOARD of the National Christian Association has its headquarters at No. 8 Portland St., Worcester, Mass. A full supply of books and tracts constantly on hand. Orders promptly filled. Correspondence solicited.

E. D. Bailey N. E. Sec'y.

Elder J. L. Barlow has gone to New York to bring home his wife, who has been staying with her daughter for six months for the benefit of her health.

Bro. Rufus M. Taft has charge of a thriving mission at Adams Square. The meetings are held in the schoolhouse, and already an unusual interest is manifest.

The South Worcester Union Mission continues to prosper greatly. The attendance has more than doubled since the occupancy of the new chapel. A revival interest has prevailed there.

Mr. J. A. Conant was re-elected president of the Connecticut State Christian Association. He has held that position since the first organization of the Association, and has presided with singular wisdom and fidelity. Few men have devoted themselves more unselfishly to an unpopular reform.

Among the attendants at the Hartford meeting was brother I. J. Gilbert, who has been a staunch supporter of the reform for many years.

Another venerable and tried friend was brother Alva Fenton, with his good wife, both of whom are forward in every good work.

Messrs. Tuttle, Curtis, Mitchelson, Reid, Spencer, Bacon, and others like them, have become indispensable to every convention. May they be spared to reap a bountiful harvest from their sowing.

Bro. Harvey Gray, of Bristol, Conn., is prostrated by disease, but he did not forget to make an offering to the reform when our representative lately visited his town.

Mr. Spaulding is now working in the Connecticut river towns in Mass. He has been absent nearly a month, and is having fair success.

Mr. J. W. Patch has been working in the interest of temperance in Worcester, and has secured the prosecution of a large number of saloon-keepers. He thinks the city marshal is not so vigorous as he ought to be in arresting violaters of the law. One of the daily papers tried to make capital against this temperance worker, but without success.

FURTHER FROM THE CONNECTICUT CONVENTION.

Worcester, Mass., March 26, 1883.

I failed to finish my account of the Connecticut convention last week, and will add a few things concerning the second day's session. The devotional meeting Wednesday morning, led by O. C. Bailey, was participated in by many others and manifested a due appreciation of our constant dependance on the Lord for help in our work. Mr. J. A. Conant was re-elected president; James Reid, vice-president; Geo. Smith, secretary; C. T. Collins, treasurer. Other vice-presidents were elected for the different counties of the State. Elder J. L. Barlow was re-elected State lecturer.

Considerable time was devoted to a general discussion of the reform work, participated in by Messrs. Barlow, Conant, Perry, Bailey and others.

Elder H. Davis of Southington, led the devotional meeting in the afternoon, taking for a text the words, "Without me ye can do nothing." The remarks elicited by this theme were full of interest and profit. After an address resolutions were presented by Elder J. L. Barlow and discussed. They will be forwarded by the secretary. In the absence of brother C. T. Collins, Bro. Geo. Smith led the half-hour devotional meeting in the evening, after which Elder Barlow addressed the convention in his characteristic manner and the convention adjourned.

The number of delegates from abroad, who attended some sessions of the convention, was larger than on previous years, but many of them did not remain throughout all the sessions. The local attendance was smaller than we had hoped, but a hopeful and encouraging feeling pervaded the meeting and there is no doubt but good was accomplished. There were present from Hartford some persons whose friendship to the cause was significant and who are believed to have been greatly benefitted.

The expenses of the convention, which were somewhat large, were promptly met and a balance left in the treasury—enough to cheer the hearts of the workers. This is a most excellent omen, showing that the Connecticut friends do not mean to shrink from duty, even when the pocket-book is pressed. On the whole we feel the convention was reasonably successful, though we expect to do better next time.

The son of Bro. C. T. Collins has passed away, after a prolonged sickness, consumption being the disease. He was an only son, twenty-two years of age and very helpful to his parents, who take pleasure in remembering his Christian hope. This bereavement was frequently and tenderly remembered during our meeting in Hartford and the bereaved parents have the warmest sympathy of many friends.

Yesterday I preached in Willimantic, in the absence of Elder Barlow. The congregations were good and the day was a pleasant one to me. The afternoon temperance meeting, of which Mr. J. A. Conant is president, still thrives, notwithstanding the manifest desire on the part of some that it should perish. It is fulfilling a mission. E. D. Bailey.

THE MICHIGAN STATE CONVENTION.

Allegan, March 20, 1883.

The next meeting of the Michigan State Association has been called to meet in Grand Rapids, on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of April next. Luce's Hall has been engaged for the occasion, and every effort will be made by the friends in the city to make the meeting a success, and also to furnish entertainment for those who may come. We expect Bro. Starry, of Iowa, to be present to give the inside view of lodge work by the light of three tallow candles, while Bro. Stoddard and others will turn the electric lights of God's truth upon these systems of error, thus bringing to light the hidden things of darkness.

But there is one thing we must remember, and that is this: These brethren may do their part right grandly, but if we fail to do onrs, in the way of attendance and support, the meeting will not be a success. Let us then rally from all parts of the State to this annual gathering. Grand Rapids is a railroad center, easy of access from every quarter, aud we can, if we will, make this a meeting of the most intense interest. We believe there are five hundred men and women in Michigan whom God will hold responsible for any failure in this meeting if they are uot present. Are you one of them?

As had been reqnested, let all the subscribers to Alliance stock come if possible, that we may counsel together. Bro. Foote made our heart throb with hope with his subscription for thirty-five shares of stock, why not others do likewise, and prove their faith by their works.

Remember the date. the 17th, 18th and 19th of April, and the plaee, Luce's Hall, Grand Rapids.

FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

THE NON-MASONS.

Bunker Hill, Ind., Mar. 27.

In Grant county I found a growing distrust of the lodge, and greater freedom of speech on the subject thau heretofore. Intelligent persons who have studied the system readily detect its presence where once they would not have even suspected any interference from that source. Several instances of a mysterious nature have awakened strong suspicion and in some cases compelled even the unwilling to distrust the purity and patriotism of members, as well as of the secret orders themselves. I find in Indiana as elsewhere the impression that we are nearing a crisis in which great changes are inevitable. The thonghtful, and more especially Christian people, everywhere are of the opinion that the present state of things cannot long continue. People begin to talk of violent upheavals which shall revolutionize society and restore the old landmarks of purity in the church and justice in the State. There is a wonderful and alarming feeling of insecurity and distrust among men, which is largely owing to the exclusiveness and partiality fostered and practiced by the secret orders

One prominent source of this widely extended feeling is found in the receut developments of the work of "Fenians" in Ireland, the "Socialists" in Rnssia, and the "Black Hand" society in Spain, which are recognized as identical in principle with Freemasonry and kindred secret conspiracies against justice and equal rights in America. Even the brief sketches reaching the people through the Masonic presses. have done much to elicit thought and deepen the conviction, that since "like canses produce like results," our only security from assassinatiou is in the abolition of all associations that, like the "Invincibles" or "Iuner Circle," meet in secret and swear to conceal each other's crimes and proteet each other's persons, or forfeit their own lives by exposing the guilty. While this is true, it is also true that many are deterred from taking a decided stand for the right through fear of personal injuries. This fear is very largely the product of ignorance. The people at large know very little of what is being done by those churches that maintain a testimony against secret societies, or of the work of the N. C. A., and feel isolated and alone in a great measure. They see the evil, apprehend the danger, but tremble in presence of the mighty array against them. They have learned by observation that "popular government" administered by members of the "Secret Empire," who hold their obligation of brotherhood paramount to the civil oath, is a failnre; and that courts of law are often instruments of cruelty and potent engines of injnstice in the hands of unscrnpulons men, by which they rob and oppress the innocent and unprotected victims of their hate, and they lack the fortitnde to step right out where they will become a target for every shaft which the enemy has in his well-stored quiver.

In a great majority of instances these persons are NOT COWARDS. They are men and womeu who "do not count their lives dear" if sacrificed to some purpose in a worthy cause; bnt they fail to see how, by sacrificing self they will promote righteousness and coutribute to the destruction of the "works of the devil." What such people need is information. Put them in possession of the faets, and show them how to make their inflnence available, and in most cases they will gladly fall into line. To find fault or scold will do no good. It will more frequently repell than incite men to activity. They are convinced but fail to see, and hence to improve their opportunities. Patience on our part, the logic of events ordered in Divine Providence, a thorough and extensive dissemination of reform literature, and above beyond and more potent than all else the Spirit of power from on high, is to convince, quicken and lead the masses into the truth.

JOURNEYING AMONG FRIENDS.

March 28.—A five miles walk brought me from Bnnker Hill to the hospitable home of our tried and active coworker, Isaac Craue, where I met a cordial welcome. For near twenty years Bro. Crane's companion has been silently waiting the voice of the archangel and the sound of the trnmpet and he is following to join the silent throng. Capability and careful managemeut is indicated by "a plaee for everything and everything in its place" on his premises. His house, kept by Miss Susan Logan, is a model of excellent taste and scrnpulous neatness. This lady is devoted to the church of her fathers and faithfnlly follows its teachings, believing as she says, that the priest is given power on earth to forgive sins. I can but admire her calm devotion and do not doubt her sincerity, but am really at a loss to understand how so intelligent a person with an open Bible in her hand, can entertain such views. She reads and is much interested in the Cynosure, and our general reform work but has no fellowship with the "Indepeudent Catholic" movemeut. Here, too, I learued of the decease of two of our valued helpers, Jacob Shawmun, and Bro. Hyatt. Bro. S. was an active member of the U. B. chureh, worshiping in Crider Chapel, and Bro. Hyatt held his membership with the Wesleyan Methodist church near Rising Sun. I learned, too, of one of our subscribers engaged in brewing. who has discontinued his paper because it is too radieal on temperance.

Dr. S. L. Cook was here some two or three weeks since, and after speaking at a few points concluded to postpone further work on account of protracted meetings which were absorbing the interest and time of the people.

From here I go to Peru. and then to Bunker Hill, for an address in the Baptist church at 7: 30 this P. M.

FURTHER TESTIMONY.

The town of Marion has grown considerably since I saw it over two years ago. A fine conrt-house, costing $170,000, adorns its pnblic square; substantial school houses, fine business blocks and tasty private residences have been added, giving to the place an appearance of thrift.

The craft has been busy and several noteworthy instances have been reported to me. Oue is of a Mason who iuduced a young girl "not the daughter of a brother," to accompany him to Indianapolis under pretext of learning the millinery business. Having gained her confidence and the control of her person, the old story of ruin and desertion followed. The girl finally reached her brother and told the story of her wrongs. Sympathizing friends had the villian arrested and bronght into court. The case was a clear one, and the evidence seemed perfectly conclusive. The jury gave their verdict consigning the man to the penitentiary. Council for the defense then asked each juryman, "Is this your verdict." All but one said yes. He said no. This gave the condemned another chance. By a series of maneuvers and technical quibbles the case was pnt off nntil the people grew weary and the judge being "a brother lodgite" dismissed it, and now the man walks the streets of M. as pompous as Lucifer, and as pure in the eyes of the law as the angel Gabriel. One "brother" employed by the railway ventnred a remonstrance and questioned the justice of such proceedings. He was quietly admonished by Col. C. and others, more advanced in a knowledge of the "Sacred Mysteries," and told that if he wished to retain his place he "had better keep still." And so he did, for his own safety and "the honor of the worshipul fraternity," and the town has to bear the disgrace which the lodge has thrust upon it by this method of teaching piety, morality and science.

THE CONNECTICUT MEETING.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY.

Willimantic, Conn., Mar. 27, 1883.

The Annual State Convention of the Connecticut Christian Association met according to notice in Melodeon Hall, Hartford, Tnesday, March 20th, at 2 o'clock P. M. The first hour was a devotional service led by Rev. A. M. Ahgren, of Hartford. The Scripture read was Phil. 4:4-8. We did "Rejoice" because the Holy Spirit was very present with the nineteen present. This honr, as all the time given before each meeting for prayer, was wholly occupied by song, prayer and testimony.

At 3 o'clock the Convention was called to order by Prest. J. A. Conant. Prayer was offered by Bro. O. C. Bailey. The usual routine of business was followed. Reports aud speeches were given by the different workers. Bro. A. S. Spanlding gave a favorable report of work done in Connecticut and New England generally. Rev. E. D. Bailey gave some interesting facts showing the interferance of the lodge with the administering of jnstice. Bros. Perry, Gilbert, Bacon and McCracken reported favorably from their respective fields. State Lecturer Barlow reports one call for a lectnre which was given with fair resnlts. He also allnded to the fact of the lodge being a "House divided against itself." Bro. J. D. McKnight of Ellington, reports no lodge in his town.

In the evening Rev. C. L. McCracken, of Thompsonville, discoursed from the subject "Why I oppose Masonry," which he will give to the Cynosure for publicaion, D. V. Rev. E. D. Bailey gave a minnte history of the work done in New England and some of the plans for the future. He was "brim full" with words of encouragement, and by faith was taking hold of greater advancement in the reform.

Wednesday evening Elder Barlow gave an address for two hours, of facts and points of interest as they came to his view, to the enlightenment of all. The digestion of those facts was the easiest to the man who did not have a rope three times rounnd his body.

The Convention was made sad by learning that the little son of treasurer C. T. Collins was at the point of death. His family had our prayer and sympathy. With the exception of Bro. Collins, and he was present to give his report, the programme was carried out. Truly God blessed and prospered us in all that we put our hands to do. The limit was on onr part. To the Triune God be all the glory.

LITERARY.

The Century for April is strongest in its illustrations. Its portraits of Emerson and Webster, the sea view drawn with a graver by Kingsley, and the two reproductions of paintings by Frouentin are worthy the high character of the Century for work of this kind. The leading article is another of the second childhood of Ben. Perley Poore's the aged Washington correspondent. He neglects no opportunity of aggrandizing the Freemasons, fact or no fact, and also. of snubbing any who have nobly borne a part against the order. His article on the Capitol at Washington has many interesting features, but is marred by the interference of his lodge obligations. The attempt to reduce Solomon's song to the proportions of a Greek drama is ingenious if it has no other merit. Mrs. Jackson ("H. H.") describes the Passion Play of Oberammergau, and Edward Clarence Stedman writes appreciatingly of Emerson.

The Wheelman for April is a magazine of interesting material and in illustration and finish will rival snch older journals as the Century and Harper's. The articles are generally bicycler's notes of travel, which have something of the zest of ancient notes of travel, when on foot or horseback men went at leisure through the vaired or monotonous scenes of country life. The Wheelman is the most permanent featnre of the bicycle furore that we have remarked. It may help to secure and popularize an important improvement in our methods of locomotion. The Wheelman Co., Boston; $2.00 per year.

The Chinese American is a new journal published in New York, in the Chinese language. Its editor, Mr. Wong Chin Foo, is a political refugee, who fled from the Empire, leaving a wife and child. Since coming to America, he has taken a collegiate course and lectures. The contents of this publication are devoted, first, to a general review of affairs iu America, and then, and principally, to news from the Pacific Coast and China. Mr. Wong has two Chinese amanuenses, who, with India ink transcribe the articles at his dictation on sheets of paper, which are then photo-lithographed and printed by Messrs. Cole Bros., of New York City. The paper used is a bright sunflower color.

—"H. H." the accomplished lady writer of Colorado has taken to California a government commission authorizing her to act in behalf of certain Indians in the lower part of that State. She is looking up some place where they can live without molestation from the whites. The "Century" will shortly begin a series of articles from her pen on the Franciscan mission of Southern California.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"WHAT SHALL THE HARVEST BE?"

On the Western Reserve of Ohio there is a strong temperance sentiment, and yet, there the liquor dealer plies his inhuman traffic, by night and by day. Here, within the last year, agents or lecturers working on this temperance sentiment, have been especially active, visiting nearly every township, organizing "Good Templar" lodges. Their manner of proceeding is to advertise a temperance lecture. In that lecture they dilate eloquently on the evils of intemperance and the necessity of an active, live temperance society, and especially recommending the Good Templar organization; but if you don't have that you must have some other. They say the secrecy part of the organization amounts to nothing, only a password, which they are at liberty to reveal after three months, and a few signs just so they may know each other and to protect themselves. They then, without giving opportunity for remarks or comment, call on a friend to pass around and take the names of all who are willing to go into a Templar organization as charter members. This done (if they have names enough to organize) they call on all who have given their names to remain, while all others are requested to retire when they administer the obligation, or, as they choose to call it, a "promise," and they find themselves organized in a lodge.

In this manner ministers of the gospel even are drawn into these societies. But what a change comes over men, Christian men, after taking the first step. The outspoken anti-secrecy man immediately discovers that all societies, all organizations, have their secrets; all business men have their secrets; and even our families and our churches have their secrets; therefore, they are secret societies just as much as we are—and all the time protesting that they have no secrets, only just to protect themselves from being imposed upon!

Just the same arguments that secret society men use for the organizations. The work, as soon as they are organized, seems to be especially to get in the youth of both sexes. Is it on the presumption that the Good Templar wife and mother will more surely submit to be the Masonic wife and mother in the future.

Is this true temperance work, as many in these organizations honestly, no doubt, believe; or is this the labor of designing men to prepare the minds of the young, and to sow the seeds of secrecy? to sow it on such nicely prepared ground, where it is sure to grow and bring forth a bountiful harvest for the lodge? If the latter, "O what shall the harvest be?" J. A. Y.

A MUCH NEEDED REFORM AMONG REFORMERS.

Woodland, Cal.

Editor Cynosure:—Without intending to be censorious or dictatorial I would respectfully ask a hearing in the columns of our excellent paper on a subject that to me seems vital to the success of the reform, in which so many earnest Christians are laboring with a zeal and endurance befitting a cause involving the dearest interest of church, country and home; and, over and above all, and beyond all, involving the salvation of the souls of men. It is no holiday sport to fight this man of sin, so strongly intrenched in church and state, although we fully believe it to be a

"Monster of such hideous mien
That to be hated needs but to be seen;"

and just here is the battle-ground on which this conflict is to be decided. If the people can be induced to lay off their colored glasses and look at this monster in his native ugliness, its true character would be at once once discovered, and the lovers of truth and light and purity and right would turn away with loathing, and unite their efforts with the friends of truth and lovers of God to remove this plague from our beloved land. But just here the good-man argument comes in and we are told that there associations can't be so bad or so many good men would not belong to them.

A few weeks since after a long talk with a gentleman, in which I gave him multiplied quotations from Masonic authors, showing Masonry to be a religion promising salvation from sin, and yet rejecting Christ and placing the Bible on a level with the Koran, without attempting an argument in reply he simply asked, "Don't you know that more than three-quarters of the Methodist ministers in the land are Freemasons?" Of course I did not attempt to deny it and now I have reached the point that led me to take my pen this morning, to ask, Is it right for Anti-masons in the church to support Masons in the pulpit, either by paying toward their salaries or even attending on their pulpit ministrations?

It is a well-known fact that thousands of Anti-masons in the various churches of the land are thus supporting secretism, and when spoken to on the subject will ask "What better can I do? I must have the means of grace, and if I have them I must pay for them." Let me tell you dear brother in all Christian faithfulness and honesty what better you can do. If in your community there are two or three who are loyal to Christ, meet with them for praise and prayer and enjoy His presence who has said to all such, "there am I in the midst of them." Then you are under no obligation to pay the hireling in the pulpit who officiates alternately at a Christless and a Christian altar, and the money saved can be made to glorify God by aiding some faithful watchman on Zion's walls, who, amid reproach and scorn is warning the people of their danger and their sin; or with his money saved a bountiful supply of spiritual food in the form of religious reading-matter may be procured for your family; or, if already supplied, then by sending a copy of the Cynosure or American Wesleyan, or some other religious paper that is loyal to Christ, to some friend who will read, you may thus be scattering light and working with God and his faithful ones in "pulling down the strong holds." In multiplied ways can money be used in doing good to the bodies and souls of men, but may the Father of light give us the light of his truth that shall make us as Anti-masons free from the folly of paying our money to support Masonry in its strong hold, the Pulpit.

But some one will say, I am a member of the church and must support it. I would say, if membership in the church involves the necessity of supporting a Masonic minister, then obey the Bible rule, "Come out from among them." Better stand alone with God than go with the multitude to do evil.

"Dare to be a Daniel,
Dare to stand alone;
Dare to have a purpose firm,
Dare to make it known."

NEW ENGLAND TEMPLARS' REVELRY.

Kingston, Tenn.

The Boston Transcript of Feb. 1st devotes the best part of two columns to a glowing account of the reception and ball of the Boston Commandery of Knights Templars, tendered to their New England brethren, in the Massachusetts Charitable Mechanic Association building, on Jan. 31st. It is represented as "the most delightful ballroom scene ever witnessed in Boston," and as being composed of "the cream of the Masonic element."

There are some points in the account of this brilliant affair that are worthy of consideration as signs of the times.

"The decorations of the ballroom were emblematic of the order of Templars. * * * * * In front of the decorations directly at the back of the stage was, on each side a bronze Roman altar, * * * from them flames were emited the entire night, representing the burning of incense, * * * * opposite the stage was, a painting representing the seal of the Commandery, consisting of a cross and crown." What has such a company to do with the cross of Christ, the most sacred emblem of the Christian church displayed in such a place of revel, could the professed Christians present, or the ministry of Boston, see no inconsistency in this mixing of sacred things with pagan rites, and the vanity and frolic of the ballroom. No, they will find nothing to rebuke but will rather applaud it as does the daily press of that city.

But again: "The Boston commandery numbering about two hundred and forty men, and commanded by Eminent Sir John L. Stevenson, marched into the ballroom." (The above named man is a noted saloon keeper in Boston.) After this, other commanderies from different parts of the State marched in, followed by "Sir Benjamin Dean, the Most Eminent Grand Master of the United States, with his staff," after due salutation he was seated on the platform, this done and a political body appears. Gov. Butler and his Staff entered "and were honored by a general salute." His excellency of thirty-two degrees then took a seat upon the platform. The next "brilliant scene" was a march led by a liquor distiller of Medford. Does New England or "cultured Boston" see no danger in this peaceful union of the rum traffic and politics in the courts of Masonry? If we mistake not, the continuation of such a union will result in greater corruption than we have yet seen.

In the report, the Transcript gives an eighth of a column to a description of the rich an exquisite dress of the ladies. Here is where the influence for fashionable dress comes from, which is doing so much to ruin good taste, good health and the morals of society. Supper was served at eleven o'clock, after which this "high carnival" continued its cultivation of licentiousness in the social dance until four o'clock in the morning, when the "brilliant affair" closed. A CELEBRATED TRIAL.

Montmorenci, Ind., March 27, 1883.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—I have not seen in the Cynosure any notice of the Gougar–Mandler slander suit, now being tried in LaFayette, Ind. Possibly I may have overlooked. Mrs. Helen M. Gougar is a very reputable and estimable lady, the wife of John D. Gougar, an attorney at law, and very fine, inoffensive, good man. I have been several days present, and witnessed the character of the trial, and it is really shameful. On its very face it is an envious, malicious attack of the liquor dealers and Masonic fraternity, to overthrow a woman whose purity and power they fear; and sworn evidence was received in court that these liquor thieves and scoundrels had said, "This woman must be crushed," for she was and is a great champion for the W. C. T. U., and also in favor of woman suffrage, and she is very popular with the majority of the good people throughout our country. I felt it my duty to seek an interview with her and her husband, and learned that they had never joined secret societies, and were not aware of the agitation against them, especially Freemasonry. I had several months ago sent her a letter and an Anti-masonic tract inclosed, but she had never received it. The courage and grace with which she meets her foul accusers in court is indeed praiseworthy and very remarkable.

No good man or woman can, we think, look into her face without breathing a prayer of sympathy to God for her against her heartless enemies. And well they may, for her case is a representative one. For if the liquor thieves and slanderers may, with impunity, destroy the fair name of one of us, they may of all of us; or would be emboldened to attempt it at least. When she told me of her non-affiliation with Masonry, I said, "I can now understand your ease better, and why you are pursued so maliciously and mercilessly;" and told her as I did in the letter which she never got, "You can never successfully oppose the liquor traffic while you leave Masonry untouched."

One thing about this trial is conspicuous to any careful observer, namely, If the woman were ever so guilty it is certain very few, if any, of her enemies betray a sincere belief in her guilt. They are only opposed to her because of her sentiments and her persistence in telling them to such good advantage. The unanimity with which the evil class of people condemn her and the good confide in her and maintain her part, is worthy of much note. L. B. B.

AROUND THE TABLE.

A Vermont "Inquirer" asks a question of our New York friends to which we call their attention and will be glad to print a reply from them:

"We would like to know why the Anti-masons of New York do not have petitions every year before the legislature for the repeal of those charters which have been given to secret societies. Prayers to heaven, I fear, will not avail much where prayers to the ligislature are so neglected. How can men pray for the kingdom to come and make no effort to remove such an obstacle in the way of it as the charters of Masonic lodges? The Anti-masons of New York are exceedingly outraged by their legislature in its chartering secret associations."

Friend Bufkin, of Iowa, of whom a note appeared last week, is not unobservant of affairs in Los Angeles, Cal., though sickness prevents his usual activity in persuading men of the truth against lodgery:

"Although a beautiful city, yet this is none the less a wicked city. To-day is the Sabbath; the citizens generally pay no attention to it—shops, stores, saloons, and almost everything is in full blast. Yet it is a neat and tolerably quiet city, for the immense throng that is continually passing its streets. God has blessed this part of the land with a good climate where to-day thousands of bushels of oranges and lemons are hanging on the trees, their golden hue claiming the praise of the husbandman to the Creator. But alas! it seems that the idol of their hearts have drawn them away from their Creator. They worship their idols which consist of fine orange, lemon, peach, apricot and pomegranite groves, vineyards, fine carriages, etc. Yet among these there are a few who love and serve God. I attended the Congregational church to-day; the pastor seems in good earnest for the salvation of souls, and the Sunday-school was quite interesting.

The peach and apricot trees are now in full bloom and promise a good harvest, while new potatoes, tomatoes, beans, beets and the general garden vegetables are already on the market. Roses, pinks and a variety of other flowers are in full bloom. On my way here I distributed tracts from the Cynosure office, in Missouri, Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona and California, and hope some of them at least may prove a blessing to those who read them. This city like most all California cities and towns are cursed with almost every secret society known; and I think God will have to send some scourge on this golden State to bring the people nearer him."

Bro. Isaac Bancroft, has not once or twice proved himself a good soldier for Christ. His experience traveling and speaking in the severe cold weather of last winter affected his health. He says:

"I have not been at work since I last wrote you; have been laid up with soreness of varicose veins in my left leg; but they are now about well and I think I shall soon be able to take the field again. I believe in paying as we go and am for paying for the property purchased in Washington right away. I will try and pay my share as soon as needed. I am also for that great National Christian gathering of all that will unite and work together for the utter destruction of Satan's kingdom of darkness, and will be present if God permit."

Bro. L. S. Cooper, of Topeka, Kans., notifies us of the last meeting held by Bro. Feemster before he had to go home, too unwell to continue:

"Our dear Bro. P. S. Feemster is well adapted to the work of State agent and lecturer, and is prosecuting with zeal the plan of organizing by counties. He worked so hard while here in Topeka that he over-taxed his body. Our county organization is not strong, but we hope to be able to strengthen our stakes before the State meeting to be held here next fall.

This city is a hot-bed for almost every species of organized secrecy, "evolving" a few new species. The pressure on "antis" is a great many pounds to the square inch. This battle is the Lord's and he only can give us victory."

—Prince Sardan Herman Singh, heir to one of the richest provinces in Northern India, has been converted to Christianity. This will require him to renounce his claims to his princely estates; but, like Moses, he esteems the reproach of Christ greater riches than the treasures of his principality.—Am. Messenger.

Saul, who is called Paul. His parentage. His parents were Jews of the tribe of Benjamin. They were "Hebrews of the Hebrews," i.e., they were not proselytes, but could trace their descent in the direct line from Abraham. They were "of gentle extraction and accustomed to move in the very highest grade of society." His father was a Roman citizen, possessing the peculiar rights of citizens, probably as a reward for distinguished services to the Roman State. He was a Hellenist, i.e., a Greek-speaking Jew.

His birth. Paul was born at Tarsus, the chief city of Cilicia, in Asia Minor, probably about the year A. D. 2.

His name. He was named Saul ("the desired one,") after the first King of Israel. This was his Jewish name. But it was usual among the Hellenists to carry two names, one for use amongst their own countrymen, the other amongst the heathen. Especially as a Roman citizen would Saul have another Roman name. Hence he was also called Paul ("little"), a favorite among the Cilicians, and nearest approach in sound to his Hebrew name.

His relatives and friends. He may have been an only son, but he certainly had a sister who afterwards married and settled in Jerusalem (Acts 23: 16). In the Epistle to the Romans he speaks of his two kinsmen (Rom. 16: 11). At Tarsus, Saul became acquainted with Barnabas, and probably with the family of Timothy.

His education. Tarsus was the seat of one of the three great universities of the Pagan world, Athens and Alexandria being the others. Here could be obtained the best secular learning of the age. He was educated in piety at home, and in the law and traditions under Jewish Rabbis. He was taught the trade of tent-making, the material being cilicium, a cloth made of the long and beautiful goat's hair, for which Cilicia was noted. At about 10 years of age he was sent to Jerusalem, where he passed the next quarter of a century. It is possible that the whole family moved from Tarsus to Jerusalem. Here were two schools,—that of Hillel, Patronized by the Pharisees, and that of Shammai, patronized by the Sadducees. Paul went to the Hillel school, under the teaching of Gamaliel, the most eminent of all the Jewish doctors. Here he studied the Bible, Roman law, and the Greek literature.

His early history. Paul continued many years under Gamaliel. There was scarcely his equal in Jerusalem for his knowledge of the law and general erudition. His moral character was marked by the strictest rectitude. He took the degree of Rab, the first step of honor, and then received from the University of Jerusalem the diploma of Rabbi, which greatly aided him in his subsequent labors. He combined in himself all the qualities that indicate future greatness. He was elected to the Sanhedrim as a scribe. This could not be before he was 35, his probable age at the martyrdom of Stephen, in which he took an active part.—Condensed from Lewin.

"Breathing out threatenings", etc. Better as in the Rev. Ver. breathing threatening and slaughter as his vital air. The Greek participle, literally, breathing-in is somewhat more emphatic than the English. He lived, as it were, in an atmosphere of threats and slaughter.—Plumptre. It must have greatly intensified his rage to see that the more he persecuted the Church the faster it grew; and his every effort to put out the Gospel fire, but spread and multiplied the flames.—Peloubet.

"And desired....letters to Damascus." It is customary in the East to issue letters of authority or protection, answering somewhat to the passport, always nominally, often practically, required in European countries. These sometimes carry with them some special commission or authority. Thus Nehemiah (chap. 2: 7,8) received letters from the king to the governors of Palestine; so at the present day the traveller in Turkey has to provide himself with letters (a firman) from the Porte or a pasha, commending him to the protection of the subordinate authorities. This firman must be authenticated by the sultan's cipher, containing the interlaced letters of his name. Without this firman the traveller is always liable to arrest as a suspicious character. The letters granted to Paul probably partook of this character, and were necessary, both as a passport and as an authorization to the synagogue officers in Damascus.—Abbott.

"Damascus." The oldest city in the world. Situated about 140 mile, north-east of Jerusalem. According to Jewish tradition it was built by Uz, the great grandson of Noah. In St. Paul's time it must have had a large population. The Jewish population alone was 50,000. It has a present population of between 150,000 and 250,000, composed of Jews, Moslems, and Christians. It is now under Turkish rule. Travellers describe with enthusiasm the marvellous beauty and salubrity of its site.

It is evident that Christians were then so numerous at Damascus, that a report of them had reached Jerusalem. Probably several natives of Damascus had been converted on the day of Pentecost, and some of the dispersed who travelled as far as Phenice and Antioch, might have reached Damascus. Being a great mercantile city, there was a constant influx of strangers. Paul may have fixed on Damascus as the sphere of his persecuting zeal, on account of the number of Christians there. Perhaps also, as Lange remarks, he regarded Damascus as the gate to the dispersed Jews of the East in Mesopotamia, Babylon, and Assyria, and it seemed to him to be above all things necessary that the gate should be closed.—Gloag.

"Might bring them bound unto Jerusalem." The mission implied that the offence, as being against the Holy Place and the Law, as involving what would be called, in modern language, sacrilege and heresy, was beyond the jurisdiction of the subordinate tribunals, and must be reserved for that of the council (see Matt. 5: 22; 10: 17).—Plumptre.

"Suddenly there shined round about him a light from heaven." In chapter 22: 6 we are told that the time of the day was "about noon" when the vision was seen, and in chapter 26: 13 Paul says that "at mid-day" the light was "above the brightness of the sun." The mid-day glare of an Eastern sun is of itself exceedingly bright, and the hour was chosen, we cannot doubt, in order that "the glory" of this heaven-sent light should not be confounded with any natural phenomena. It was in the midst of this glory that Christ was seen by Saul (1 Cor. 15: 8), so that he can enumerate himself among those who had beheld the Lord after his resurrection.—Cambridge Bible.

"Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" The name is repeated for emphasis. It is evident, from verse 7 and chapter 26: 14, that there was an audible voice, not merely a spiritual impression produced on the mind of Saul. Observe the form of the question. Why persecutest thou me? not my disciples nor my church.—Schaff. Christ speaks of himself as persecuted by Saul, because "in all the affliction of his people he is afflicted" (Isa. 63: 9), and "whoso toucheth them, toucheth the apple of his eye" (Zech. 2: 8).—Cambridge Bible. Paul strikes in Damascus; Christ suffers in heaven.—Bishop Hall.

"And he said, Who art thou Lord?" Observe that Saul does not yield allegiance to the unknown speaker until he has questioned him, and, by the disclosure of Saul's secret uneasiness, the speaker has given evidence of divine omniscience. They entirely misread Saul's character and the narrative here, who attribute the change in him to the effect of mere terror.—Abbott. And the Lord (Jesus) said, I am Jesus. Observe how the whole effect of this interview is to press home upon Paul's conscience his guilt as a persecutor of the Lord, and note its effect in his subsequent experience of humility and of thankfulness for divine grace (1 Cor. 15: 9, 10; 1 Tim. 1: 12–17). Observe, too, that the Lord calls himself here not Christ, the Mesiah, the name of dignity, but Jesus, Savior, the name of his earthly humiliation.—Abbott.

"To kick against the pricks," i.e., goads. Paul was resisting his own conscience, and the providence of God, and the influences of the Holy Spirit. All they "kick against the goads" (1) who disobey the laws of God; (2) who act contrary to conscience; (3) who resist the influences of the Holy Spirit; (4) who resist God's will expressed in his providences.—Peloubet.

"Saw no man." Saw nothing. He was totally blind. Saul does not appear to have ever recovered his sight as before. He came by degrees to learn, that never until he should gaze again on the glory of that light, and the One whom it environed, in the King's city, would that dimness, and perhaps a constant sense of pain, be removed from those dazzeled eyes which had gazed for a minute into the divine splendor.—Schaff.

"He was three days without sight." The blindness of Saul was no doubt mercifully intended by Providence to strengthen the powers of his mind, by compelling him to attend without distraction to the great matters which had been placed before him. The fact of this sudden and complete incapacitation would also naturally prevent his being troubled about the business on which he came, either by those to whom his letters were addressed, or those who had been the companions of his journey. This lasted three days; and the state of his mind may be gathered from the fact that he took no food or drink during that interval. His soul was full of great matters, which left no taste or thought for meaner cares. And versed as he was in the Bible, he could, even in his blindness, search the Scriptures, and, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, was enabled clearly to discern the whole scheme of Christian doctrine in its fulness and truth. He repeatedly declares, in after life, that these things were not taught him by man, not by any apostle or disciple, but were imparted to him by the Spirit of truth. He was thus enabled to speak and teach with the same underived authority and divine unction as the other apostles.—Kitto.

"There fell from his eyes as it had been scales." Not actual scales, but something resembling them. Dr. Buck, of New York, in a private letter in answer to a request for information, says that "The ophthalmia, is so common in the East, and which occasions blindness by producing opacity of the cornea, presents a grayish white spot, occupying the centre and spreading toward the circumference, thus shutting the entrance of light through the pupil into the interior of the eye. This opaque spot might readilly suggest to the popular observer the idea of the presence of a scale in the eye, and give rise to the idea that the restoration of sight was effected by the falling of something resembling a scale."—Abbott.

—"Every Christian family ought to be," says Jonathan Edwards, "as it were, a little church, consecrated to Christ, and wholly influenced and governed by his rules."

—Christ in his crucifixion and death, is the wisdom of God for us; Christ in his resurrection, is our righteousness or justification; Christ in his ascension, is our sanctification; and Christ, in his coming again, is our redemption, to wit: the redemption of our bodies. A wondrous fourfold treasure in the golden casket of the Incarnation. —W. Haslam.

OBITUARY.

Daniel Countryman, of Rochelle, Ill., died on Wednesday, March 14, and was buried from Lindenwood church on Friday, March 16, the funeral services beginning at 2 o'clock. He had been a resident of Ogle county for many years, was widely known and universally respected, as was evident from the large concourse of his neighbors and friends who came from every direction to pay their tribute of respect to his memory. About one hundred teams were standing around the church during the services and the audience crowded the building in every part.

He had suffered for many years from asthma and had long expected death, which at last came, not as a king of terrors riding down some weak and trembling coward, but as a messenger bidding a victorious soldier come into the presence of his sovereign to receive his crown. He selected the text from which he wished his funeral sermon preached, arranged respecting the bearers, bade his wife and children good bye and fell asleep in Jesus shortly after mid-day. Some of his neighbors who were not Christians seeing his calm and triumphant faith went out from his death-room weeping, and said to his sons, "I wish I had what would enable me to die like that."

He had been for many years an earnest and intelligent friend of the cause represented by the Christian Cynosure. Years ago when two young men were canvasing Rochelle in the interest of this paper, the Masons of that city said to them, that they had better go out into the country, that there was a man out there who kept such fellows as they were. They reached his home after night, receiving a hearty welcome and the assurance that he was always glad to entertain those whose business was to expose those secret orders whose purpose is the subjugation of the world, and whose prince and master is the devil. His interest in this cause did not fail even when the cold waters of death were dashing about him. He had been distributing many copies of Hon. Thurlow Weed's pamphlet respecting the Masonic abduction and murder of Wm. Morgan, and on his death bed he repeatedly took his son Calvin about the neek and charged him not to allow the work against the lodge to cease, but to carry it on in his stead. Thus are men baptized for the dead. Thus does the soldier whose pulse is failing cheer on his comrades in the fight.

The other department of Christian work in which he was most deeply engaged, was the movement for the unity of the Christian world. He realized the weakness and shame which sectarian divisions bring on the cause of Christ and longed with his whole heart to see them done away. One of the last articles he wrote was on this subject and addressed to the Rochelle Register in which it was printed. His heart ever echoed the prayer of our Saviour, "That they all may be one," and to the extent of his power he endeavored to bring the answer to this petition.

The world lacks the presence of one honest man, now that he is gone; would that we might realize more perfectly the truth that though we cannot see him, he can see us, and that although his voice never more shall reach these dull ears of clay, he may still speak to our spirits to comfort in sorrow or cheer us on in the dust and blood and heat of battle. We are surrounded by a great cloud of witnesses, therefore let us run with patience our race.

Our brother left behind him a wife and four children to revere his memory, to sorrow for his departure, to emulate his example and to look forward to a reunion in that land where the inhabitants never say, I am sick. God comfort them and enable us all to follow him as he followed Christ, until at last we shall each in Zion appear before God.

Rev. John Miller, of the North Ohio Conference, United Brethren in Christ, died at his home in Wauseon, Fulton county, Ohio, October 26, 1881, aged 72 years 1 month and 16 days. He joined the U. B. church in 1830, became a member of Scioto Conference in 1833 and was ordained in 1840. He labored principally in a local capacity, but was successful during the short time he devoted to the itineracy. He was an active helper of the various institutions of the church. He built a mission chapel in Wauseon on his own premises. When this became too small for the increasing society, he paid about one-fifth of the cost of a good, commodious brick church. In this he worshiped about one year before the Lord took him home. One day before his death, while superintending the laying of a side-walk, on being informed that his sepulchre was complete according to order, he replied, "Then I am ready for my departure. My work on earth is done." His end was peaceful. His well stored mind was clear to the last.

Brother Miller was the first Abolitionist speaker I ever saw. I was but a boy when I first heard him. He was once warned not to fill an appointment of this kind. It was declared that an unmanagable amount of eggs would be his portion if he should allow his zeal for the "nigger" to over-rule his prudence. He went. The God of Daniel and Elijah brought him safely home again. In the person of Rev. John Miller, one of the anti-secrecy reformers most ardent friends has gone to the home of the sanctified.

J. K. Alwood.

—The following, we fear, is applicable in great measure, to different parts of the country, and to different denominations: "There are two millions of Methodists in the Southern States, three-fourths of whom have been admitted to church-fellowship without considering in their case the question of change of heart as a condition of membership."—Ch. Harvester.

EDITORIAL LETTERS.

HAULING IN ITS HORNS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 22.
No. 215 4½ St., N. W.

The corner-stoue, or corner brick, of the huge govcrnment building mentioned below was laid last Monday, without the aid of false Masonry. A little while ago such a thing would not have been thought of. Thurlow Weed's letter, the Morgan monument and the increase and spread of anti-secret newspapers have intimidated the lodge, as and government officials dread to draw the notice of the press to a parade so shameful as a corner-stone laying by a secret swindling lodge of sham masons. This is the meek notice from yesterday's Star:

THE NEW PENSION BUILDING.—The first brick of the pressed-brick exterior of the new Pension office building was laid yesterday afternoon at the northeast corner of the building. Gen. Meigs and Mr. Joncs, the foreman of the works, were present and deposited a number of coins —amounting in the aggregate to thirty-one cents—under the brick. As there were a number of gamins about when this informal ceremony was performed, the new brick work was weighted down with quite a load of boards and bricks last night for fear some piratical vandal of a boy might tear away the bricks and secure the coin intended as a memorial for future antiquarians.

When the snail draws in its horns it still leaves its carcass exposed. It is too late for the lodge to hope again to escape by 'possuming; because

1st. Its religious nature is better understood than it was before.

2d. There is no all-absorbiug slave-question for it to hide under.

3d. Like Milton's Sin it has "a cry of hell-hounds" around its waist: Nihilism, Socialism, Communism, Fenianism and Mollies, which, when pressed, like those fabled sin-dogs, retreat into the bowels of their mother, and thus expose their kennel. And the professedly benevolent secret orders, are getting to be well understood to be all children of the same dark mother, wearing her lineaments and features. Still, Satan has so long deceived the nations, that only the angel with the key of the bottomless pit can fully arrest his power.

THE CASE OF THE UNITED BRETHREN.

CHAMBERSBURG, Pa., March 28, 1883.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I think I now fully understand the case of the church of the United Brethren in Christ. The German historian of this church, U. G. Spayth, says:

"From the very commencement, the United Brethren in Christ, refused to receive members of such (secret) societies except on one condition, viz: separation from such orders."

"June 8th, 1826 [four months before Morgan was murdered,] after a thorough discussion the Conferance adopted a paper" which said "If any of our brethren should hereafter join said fraternity they shall thereby expel themselves from the connection." (Spayth quoted by Lawrence). This was no Morgan excitement," but months before Morgan was heard of.

The Constitution of the Brethern church, published in the Discipline above forty years ago, says: "Sec. 7. There shall be no connection with secret combinations. In 1869, at Lebanon, Pa., the General Conference after several days sharp conflict, put the following words into the Discipline:

1. Any member or preacher who shall connect himself with a secret society * * * * shall be considered as having withdrawn from the church.
2. No person shall be permitted to join our church while holding membership in a secret society.

Again:

Bishop David Edwards wrote me daily during the great Lebanon struggle (1869) and gave praise and glory to God over the result. W. J. Shuey voted in the Miami Conference to petition the Lebanon General Conference to repeal the law against all secret societies and adopt only advice against them; that is, to let Masonry and her whole brood into the church. He was a member of the Lebanon Conference, and seeing the powerful opposition to secret societies, he took the current and voted for the law! Since that time he has employed Masons and Odd-fellows in the Telescope office, and published a tract advocating a change of the law, and added a note to his tract, attempting to form the ministers into a caucus against the existing rule against secret societies, cited above, Peter's wicked two-faced dissembling; and the lying of Ananias to the Holy Ghost to save money, are parallells to the wicked conduct of this brother. He is, or was trustee of the First United Brethren church in Dayton, which presiding Elder Halleck Floyd said in the Telescope, Aug. 6, 1879, had then "about forty members of secret societies in it;" received by the pastor, at least some of them, in contempt of the Discipline cited above. This pastor with Shuey and others started a pretended revival meeting across the street in opposition to our National Christian Convention. A man told Dr. Davis that this pastor was a member of a secret society. It was communicated to me, and I published the fact as given me "on reliable authority." The pastor, whose name is Chapman, accused me of "slander" in saying that he was a member of a secret lodge; when, by Halleck Floyd's statement, he had, at that moment, "about forty" lodge-worshipers in his church, every one of them in contempt of Christ's example and the law of his church. This preacher has now gone into a Presbyterian church as pastor from some motive or other; aud though he has thus gone out of the Brethren church, he is still a prominent writer in the Telescope, which accuses the King street United Brethern church of Chambersburg of being "out of the church" because they refuse to receive and obey men like Shuey and Chapman, who are, as shown above, simply traitors to the origin, history, constitution, discipline, and rules of the church of the United Brethren in Christ.

THE CHAMBERSBURG TROUBLE.

I need not give dates and facts. The case is succinctly this. Some godly brethren here stood firm for the history and constitution of the Brethren church, given above. The authorities began to oppress them, sought to disband their classes, to put out their leaders, such as Bishop, Fohl, Nicklas, Oylr and other blameless and good men, several of whom I have seen here, but whose names escape me at this writing. Bishop Glossbrenner and one or two other bishops were chief in the treachery and dissimulation practiced against these upright and blameless men and women. They were likely to succeed in crushing the class-leaders here, when they clubbed their money, bought a new and beautiful church on King street, and kept the deeds of the old church, which they now tell me receives members without question, like the First church of Dayton.

I preached to the King street church twice on Sabbath, and attended "love-feast" on Monday forenoon. A clearer-minded set of Christians I have never seen, and as all spoke in love-feast, I had a good opportunity to judge. Some of the clerical sneaks came to Peter Nicklas and told him his business would suffer if he did not "compromise." "Business," said Nicklas; "that is dollars and cents. Many better men than I am have shed their blood for Christ against such things as the lodge is made of."

The position of this church is just this: They are United Brethren standing in the United Brethren church against the organized deism and idolatry of the lodge. They speak kindly of their brethren and are ready to unite with them when they put away "The accursed thing." If ex-Bishop Wright's views are reduced to practice in the General Conference at Galion, Ohio, next May, then the King street church are all right. But no voting about "laws" and "views" while the Masons run and rule the church, will make reconciliation. "Fine words butter no parsnips, and these brethren are too old birds to be caught with such chaff. Prof. Tobey is now their paster. They are united and happy and have the respect of every honest thinking man in Chambersburg, and, as the dying Wesley said, so they can say, "The best of all is, God is with us."

Yours in Christ,
J. BLANCHARD.

—We regret the necessity of putting off the publication of a very interesting letter from Bro. Dissette of Kansas. It will help make a good paper next week.

—Secretary Stoddard, after visiting Peru, Indianapolis and Dublin, and some other points in southern and eastern Indiana, will go to the Michigan State Convention by way of Chicago. Every friend who is interested in the Washington effort (and what one of them is not?) will eagerly read his letters which appear elsewhere.

—Bro. W. B. Stoddard has been spending two weeks in the neighborhood of Kingston, Kane county, Ill., after a successful canvass in the central part of DuPage county. At Kingston much of his time was connected with the preparation for the open-lodge meetings held by S. E. Starry last week with great success, hundreds attending from all the neighborhood about. Bro. Starry is engaged for degree work in Belvidere where early the reform was gradually started under the efforts of C. A. Blanchard as N. C. A. lecturer. Bro. Stoddard has calls from Elgin, Sycamore, Lostant and other points in the State to come and canvass for the Cynosure and reform literature.

HON. THADDEUS STEVENS.

"THE GREAT COMMONER."

This great American and distinguished statesman was born to poverty, with a deformed foot, on the rocky soil of Vermont, in Danville, Caledonia county, April 4, 1792. His mother kept a few cows, and by her toil and thrift educated him at Dartmouth College; while by her piety she fixed the principles and shaped the destiny of her son.

One who saw him at Dartmouth, where he graduated in 1815, saw nothing in him when he went there but a bashful, timid and retiring boy. Barnes, the historian of the 39th Congress, says of him in that body: "The timid became bold, and the resolute were made stronger by his evident honesty and patriotism, coupled with a cool assurance, which, an unfriendly critic says, sometimes rose almost to the moral sublime." That was the Congress of 1865–6, which weathered our stormy national cape, with a President, who was afterward impeached as a traitor, at the helm. And Brackett says of his speech in the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, which Mr. Stevens moved Feb. 22, 1868, "It was one of the ablest and most logical speeches ever delivered before a court." So strikingly does his life's beginning contrast with its close. He was then 76 years of age, and in daily expectation of his death, which occurred a few months afterward, Aug. 11, 1868.

Leaving college at 23, he taught school and studied law at York, Pa. The York bar had voted that no one should practice in their courts who had another occupation. Stevens had been teaching and was rejected. He crossed into Maryland, was examined and admitted to the bar; went back to Gettysburg, Adams county, Pa., and opened an office. There he had not only to face poverty, like many young barristers, but the stinging taunt of the lawyers, whom he yet shortly eclipsed and distanced, who called him "the club-footed attorney."

Would that he had then married a woman like his own mother. But he never married; perhaps because of his poverty, perhaps of his deformed foot; a like affliction is said to have made Byron a misanthrope. Women are apt to be tinged by the religion of the surrounding churches; and those churches Stevens regarded with contempt. They were all intensely pro-slavery. A Presbyterian elder and county judge incited a mob against an Abolitionist; aud when I asked Mr. Stevens about gambliug, he told me that while he was in practice an old Lutheran pastor applied to him to prosecute one of his own church-officers for slandering him. Said Stevens, "Why, Father H., what does Hans accuse you of?"

"Why, gambling."

"Gambling! What did the fellow make the story out of?"

The old gentleman said he was taking a friendly game in the back-room of a beer saloon, owned by another of his officers, and "Hans, he peeped his nose in, and went and told that we was gambling."

"Father H.," said Stevens, "you are sure there was no money on the card-table?"

"Vy, shust a leedle on one corner to give interest to de game."

Stevens advised the old man uot to prosecute.

"Thus you see," said Stevens, "how an honest man can play cards for money and not consider it gambling." He condemned the practice. "But," said he, "I live alone in my hotel, and I play for amusement and the excitement." When I last saw him in Washington, but few weeks before his death, he said to me, "I have not touched a card for over five years."

Mr. Stevens elected the good Governor Ritner, and kept up the Anti-masonic party in Pennsylvania, a full year after Fillmore and Granger had deserted, and Seward had suffered it to fall in the State of New York. During that year I lectured in the State against slavery, and then first met Mr. Stevens. The ministers, in private, bid me God-speed, but were silent on slavery, as they uow are concerning the lodge.

Stevens was boarding at Nagle's Hotel with 150 members of the legislature. I said to him, "If you cau turn your Anti-masons into Abolitionists, you will have a party whose politics will not bleach out. The slave-holders will not 'possum like Freemasons, but will die game." I had heard that he had never allowed a fugitive slave, who reached a court where he practiced, to be taken back. He took out his pocket-book, handed me $90 in bank bills, and said: "Take that and go dowu into Adams county and lecture, and if they Morganize you, we'll make a party out of it." On my declining to take it, he said, "Never mind, I am one-and-twenty in such things, and I know they cannot be done without money."

At that time Stevens' enemies accused him of gambling and licentiousness. He prosecuted a neighboring Democratic paper and obtained judgment for damages which wound it up. This I did not then know. I went to my lodgings, and, unwilling that Mr. Stevens should suppose that I waived my religion to secure his friendship, I wrote him that I knew nothing of the truth or falsehood of those charges, but had sought his acquaintance as I would that "of a wicked man of influence in behalf of a good cause, which it was for his interest to serve." His reply contained these words:

"This is the first line or word I have ever penned in explanation of my conduct as assailed by my enemies. Probably as between us and our Creator, all of us are somewhat deficient. I know I am deplorably so. But as to my fellow men, I hope so to live, that no one shall ever be wronged or suffer on my account."

I believe his confession was as sincere as his purpose was magnanimous.

In Adams county Cooper and Smyzer met me in the court-house at Gettysburg in debate. A mob, encouraged by elder and Judge McLean broke up our meeting, and would have injured me, but Cooper defended me. Mr. Stevens was enraged. He came down from Harrisburg, called and addressed a court-house meeting which was crowded to a jam, and I never listened to such speaking from human lips. Every sentence was argument, eloquence and invective combined and condensed. Giving his words as a report of his speech, without his overwhelming, crushing looks and intonations seems like pointing to a shivered tree, as a description of a thunder storm.

Judge McLean had said, "We have no slaves here, why come here to disturb our borough with discussion of slavery?" And a Universalist had used the court-house a Sabbath or two before, with no objection from the Judge.

"Indeed!" exclaimed Stevens, "So then, human liberty is become a local question, is it? to be discussed only in particular localities! There comes along a Universalist here, and you quietly hear him deny all the doctrines which Christ and the apostles preached, and allow him to pass on. But if a man comes to speak for universal liberty, him you answer with violence and rotten eggs! Shame! SHAME!! SHAME!!! What freeman does not feel himself covered all over with burning blushes, to find himself surrounded by SUCH freemen?"

At this point the poor old judge broke through the crowd and fled from the court-house. There were no more pro-slavery mobs in Gettysburg.

The Pennsylvania Constitution was to be revised. A Democratic leader and hater of Stevens thought this a good time to crush him. He issued a call for a "Convention of the friends of the integrity of the Union" to meet the day previous to the Constitutional convention. In a few weeks over seven hundred delegates were appointed to McGiffin's convention. The people were exceeding mad against the Abolitionists. A constable in Chambersburg had lately received one thousand dollars for catching and returning fugitive slaves. And a military major had lately seized and sold a free woman and five children, out of the same county, pretending they were slaves, and bought a uniform with the money! Such men throughout the State raised mobs of boys, who, when undeceived, were ready to mob on the other side. Van Buren wished to secure a re-nomination, and John Walter was sent from Washington to Harrisburg, to stir up the Democrats to suppress Abolitionism. The McGiffin convention took like fire on a dry prairie. I wrote Mr. Stevens, then at home in Gettysburg, to have Charles B. Penrose of Carlisle, appointed to the "Integrity of the Union" convention. I said, "Get Mr. Penrose to force the convention to commit itself for or against slavery. If they oppose slavery the South will oppose them. If they go for slavery, we can make the people, who really hate slavery, oppose them." To my delight and astonishment Mr. Stevens had himself appointed instead of Penrose.

The day came. I managed to squeeze into the densely packed old court-house in Harrisburg. I stood behind a pillar, and sketched and afterward wrote out a report of that remarkable melee. The report was published, and I was told that Mr. Dunlap and others at the State house next day were so overwhelmed with Mr. Stevens' truth, patriotism, justice and eloquence, blended with wit, satire and sarcasm, that reading the report they rolled on the carpet and shook their sides with laughter. Mr. Stevens shortly after saw John Quincy Adams in Philadelphia. That great man had read the proceedings, and highly complimented Mr. Stevens on his defeat of such an assault of personal, political and pro-slavery malice, veiled under professed love of the Union.

Mr. Stevens came in late, and his coming was greeted by the dense crowd with looks of fear, hatred and wrath. An old Whig, Judge Beard, was in the chair. A preacher from Pittsburgh rose, on some motion, and said:

"Born, sir, in Tennessee, raised in Kentucky, I am an exile from my native State on account of slavery; yet I have come to this convention ready to peril my all in the cause of our national Union."

Stevens, as soon as the man had done, sprang to his feet. In an instant every spit-box was kicked and rattled. Hundreds hissed, and the mouths that did not hiss, groaned and howled. It was bedlam uncapped. For a moment I was stunned, till I looked at Mr. Stevens. He turned with calm haughtiness around and looked that storm of howls and hisses in the face! Then turning, with an emphasis utterly indescribable, above the uproar he said:

"MR. PRESIDENT:—We're not slaves here in Pennsylvania! And—if—(slowly and solemnly) the attempt is made to make us such, there are some of us in this court-house who will make resistence enough to let Pennsylvanians outside know the doom that awaits them!"

The house was now so still that you could hear the clock tick. He then turned toward the preacher and imitating his drawl, said:

"Sir, I deeply sympathize with my respected friend over the way, in all that he has done and suffered in the cause of our glorious Union which we have now first met to promote! Indeed, sir, so moved am I at beholding him, an exile from his native State, driven out by slavery, that I am ready to join this convention in a vote of reprobation of that foul institution which drives white men from their homes to wander as exiles in distant States."

Here his voice, loud and clear as it was, was drowned with an uproar of applause, hands clapping and voices shouting, the same which had hissed him a few moments before. The crowd saw through the hypocritical patriotism of the preacher who had a paper to circulate; and Mr. Stevens' taking him all in pious earnest, imitating slightly his voice and manner, his mock-commiseration for the preacher, and keen, terrible satire on the pro-slavery leaders of the crowd, who, he assumed, were all anti-slavery as he was; so overwhelmed them by his drollery, wit, and sharp, fearless justice, that, from that time he had the convention wholly under his control. And when McGiffin put in his resolutions, Stevens would move to amend by adding words in favor of human liberty, from the Pennsylvania Constitution and Bill of Rights which they dare not vote down, so that he turned the whole thing into a farce, as it was, and they broke up in a roar of laughter.

Somewhile afterward I wrote Mr. Stevens that the anti-slavery cause wanted nothing but a leader such as he to insure success and make the country free, and urged him to embark in the cause for the country, God and humanity. He replied:

"I should obey your advice; but, through the failure of a partner whom I trusted with the entire control of my business, I have failed for some ninety thousand dollars; and I know no way out of such things but to pay the uttermost farthing. I have moved up to this rich county [Lancaster] to earn the means to pay my honest debts."

He did pay them. But it took him sixteen or seventeen years out of political life. He entered Congress the second time not long before Lincoln's election, when the country was reeling and rocking like the ocean in a tempest; and, to use the bold metaphor of Byron, he laid his hand on the ocean's mane!

Mr. Stevens' Congressional life is a theme for an epic poem. His ninety thousand dollars debts, which by a bankrupt law he could have paid as many professed Christians paid theirs, with the stroke of a pen, were all paid up. He had neither wife nor child. Years had chastened his ambition, and he came to his country in the hour of her supremest peril. He entered the House of Representatives just before the storm which had been brewing in Southern lodge-rooms for thirty years, was to burst on the country. Chase, a Wirt Anti-mason in 1831, was Secretary of the Treasury; Seward, the Anti-masonic leader of New York, Secretary of State; Charles Francis Adams, Anti-mason by birth and conviction, was at the English court, our chief point of danger abroad; Stanton, said to have been an original Anti-mason, Secretary of War; and Stevens, in the House, where all money bills originate, was chairman of the committee of supplies,—all appointed by Abraham Lincoln, who, of course, knew his men. These men were God's battalion of statesmen and diplomatists against the lodge-and-slavery war! They all, as Lincoln said he had, had "oaths registered in heaven;" but none registered in the lodge.

Mr. Stevens' genius seemed to be ubiquitous. He had been the soul of the first national nominating convention of the people, (September 26, 1831) ever held in this or any other country. This convention was held by Anti-masons! His nomination of Wirt and Ellmaker had failed to elect, but drew a popular vote of two hundred and twenty-eight thousand.

But now he had his heart's desire, a government unsworn to shelter crime. He labored like one inspired. The Congressional Globe shows that he made but few set speeches, and never long ones. But the House record is thick set with such entries as: "Mr. Stevens moved to go into committee of the whole on the state of the Union;" "To proceed to the unfinished business on the table," etc., etc. And when he said, "I want such a thing done." "We must to-day accomplish such and such legislation, or this or that interest will suffer," the record shows that his will was obeyed. He kept the wheels of the government oiled and in motion till they passed over the neck of the Rebellion.

Wirt, nominated in 1831, had in his acceptance styled the lodge "a political monster, as fearful as the Invisible Tribunal of Germany or the Inquisition of Spain." That invisible tribunal had inaugurated the war. The Voice of Masonry, though published in Chicago, had denounced the Union soldiers who had been drawn into the lodge and yet fought the rebels who had made Masonic signs, as "worthy of the contempt of the world of Masonry;" adding, "Masonry knows nothing about this flag or that flag;" and Stevens, who understood the crimes and treacheries of the lodge, and who in 1836 had refused to sign the new Constitution of Pennsylvania, which he had helped to make, because it denied the ballot to intelligent blacks, was now in a position where he could give his principles effect. He moved to enlist 150,000 colored soldiers. He had before moved to give freedom to slaves who should aid in suppressing the rebellion. He moved, to crown all, the 13th Amendment forever abolishing slavery in the United States. But his most stupendous exertions were given to furnish "the sinews of the war." Brockett, while lauding him, says: "His views on finance have been regarded as less sound than on other questions." And why? Because Senator Voorhees in my hearing (March 1, 1883) told the truth when he said, "A bank association comes here and dictates legislation from one end of this Capitol to the other, and every Senator knows it."

A treasury note bill, shaped by Stevens, had passed the House and thousands had congratulated him, and hoped it would become law. But a cloud of banks settled on the Senate and that body altered the notes so that they were not equal to gold but receivable for only part of the dues to the United States. This was to favor gold gambling by the banks, which it did. Stevens bitterly opposed this alteration, but finally voted for the bill as altered, because, he said, "I live among men and not among angels." It was the best he could do. Feb. 20, 1862, he made a melancholy speech in which occur the following passages:

"After we had made a currency for all, and made it equal to gold, we made an exception, and declared it was not equal to gold, and should only be a currency for some. The bill now creates money, and, by its very terms, declares it a depreciated currency."

"It makes two classes of money, one for the banks and brokers another for the people."

"The banks took fifty millions of our six per cent. bonds, and shaved the government five millions five hundred thousand dollars on them; and now ask to shave the government fifteen or twenty per cent. to pay themselves interest on those very bonds on which they had already been paid a five and a half millions shave."

Mr. Lovejoy, who did not understand it, suggested that the government "pay gold." "But," said Stevens, "the banks have suspended payment, and will not disgorge a dollar of coin; so the attempt would compel us to buy their gold at a premium, and thus put us again into the clutches of these harpies!" He then mournfully checked himself, saying: "I do not like to use bitter terms."

Jan. 8, 1863, Stevens, as chairman of the Ways and Means committee, reported against creating our present national bank currency, based on United States bonds. One needs not to understand banking, to see that Mr. Stevens, as a financier, was honest, fearless and right. If a greenback was worth a gold dollar anywhere, it should have been worth it in the United States customs, where it was not receivable. The power which created it, refused to receive it! For a time the greenbacks were worth only from one-half to three-fourths their face; the banks suspended specie payment, and used their gold to gamble; buying those bills for one-half and upward and receiving the whole of their face. Nothing but the out-burst of gold from the mountains, the victories of our armies, the millions brought by emigrants and the boundless production of free labor, kept the banks which Stevens called "harpies," from sinking the currency. And what need there was of two kinds of currency, greenbacks and national bank currency, no rational man can either understand or explain. Mr. Stevens was correct. But the country survived the double depletion of war and bank speculation. His work was well and nobly done.

Like the old reformer kings of the Hebrews, he was not personally faultless, but in his public capacity "he did that which was right before God;" and like the best and bravest of those kings, to those who reproved him he never denied his errors, but honored those most who were most faithful to him. I saw him in his brick house near the Capitol, but a few weeks before he died. The woman who kept his house said that he sometimes cried to God in his chamber alone and by himself, with groanings that alarmed the house. O how unlike Mr. Webster, or even Mr. Sew

LOVEST THOU ME?

If Christ the Lord should come to-day,
As erst to Peter by the sea,
And low and tenderly should say,
"O, my disciple! lovest thou Me?"
To thee and me,—
What would our answer be?

"Yea, Lord, thou knowest," if we should cry
With ready lip and beaming glance,
"We'd stand for thee 'neath any sky,
With flag unfurled and lifted lance,"
For thee and me
Would this the answer be?

And if he showed his hands and feet
Sore wounded on the cruel cross,—
And asked us still in accents sweet,
"Nay! lov'st thou me in pain and loss?"
From thee and me
What could the answer be?

For life is like a summer day,
So bright, so full, so glad, so strong!
And roses strew the onward way,
And we are marching with a song,—
For thee and me
What answer could there be?

Just this: "We surely love thee, Lord;
Our wills are weak, our hearts are poor
But clinging to thee, in thy word
We trust, and we shall aye endure."
For thee and me
This would the answer be.

It would not do for us to boast;
We have no merit, we are frail.
Our strength is weariness at most,
And oft when we are tried, we fail.
"But we trust thee,"—
This would our answer be.

And bliss and bane, and joy and grief
And all things work for good, if we Can answer, "Yea, Lord!" swift and brief,
To that keen question "Lovest thou Me?"
For thee and me
This should the answer be.

MORAL CHARACTER OF THE OPERA.

A Cincinnati correspondent of Zion's Herald, Boston, discusses the moral effect of the brilliant opera season just closed in the "Queen City of the West," in the following forcible paragraphs:

"Of the ten operas rendered, five were little less than glorifications of licentiousness. In one the heroine was a member of the demi-monde; in the next she was an innocent girl who yielded to the solicitations of the seducer. In both cases she is pitied, petted, languishes, and dies, only to leave the impression that her sufferings were not merited by her sin. In one opera the plot opens with the revelation of a dastardly outrage upon innocence; in another the hero is utterly given up to lust; in another he ruins his victim; and in a fourth his efforts are foiled. Thus the operas succeeded one another in an almost unbroken procession of lascivious revelations. How the effect can be other than to familiarize the opera-goer's mind with the arts of the libertine and the unchaste it would be difficult to tell. And there are no means by which the mental pictures and suggestions so vividly produced by the lifelike acting and the penetrating voice of song may be eradicated from the memory.

"In the less objectionable operas, jealousy, intrigue, and murder formed the staple of the plots; and in two of these, at least according to newspaper report, the ballet was introduced, probably to relieve the tameness of a performance which lacked the gallantries that enlivened the coarser five. That the ballet was not more largely introduced was due to the fact that it is an innovation even in the Paris of America. In the gay metropolis which Cincinnati seems bent upon imitating it is said to be all the rage. Here the managers of the festival were bold enough to secure the services of a professional danseuse whose performances were received with great favor by the immense audiences present. As the fruit of this we may confidently look for a number of experts in that shameless art to appear ere long in our own community. Yet all this did the Christian encourage and support in attending the opera.

"No doubt many were deceived by the representations which the managers made. It was given out and currently believed that the operas to be rendered were of the highest grade, and that the principal singers were ladies and gentlemen of unquestionable social and professional position. And these representations were true. There are no operas of a higher grade musically than those rendered at this festival. There are no singers more capable nor of better social standing than those who took the leading roles. But what a speaking fact is this! Out of every ten of the best operas five are unspeakably foul. As for pure operas, there are none. If the matter is unobjectionable, the action will provide the necessary obliquity; otherwise it would fall flat.

"As to the singers, what must be the state of feminine delicacy in a woman who could act the part of a member of the demi-monde, or knowingly allow any man, even in pretense, to tempt her virtue. These are matters about which the true womanly instinct forbids that she should play. It is a horrible sacrifice which the opera goer demands of the opera singer, that she should do all this for his sake."

PROBATION NOW.

Immediate, total and affectionate self-surrender of the soul to God is demanded of all responsible human beings every instant by conscience, which is the voice of God. Postponement of obedience is disobedience. All delay of surrender to God is rebellion against God. The Divine summons is incessant, and refusal to obey it is nothing less than incessant rebellion. Thousands and millions of times in a single week, or, it may be, in a single day, the Divine voice within the soul whispers, "Thou oughtest," and the soul answers, "I will not." Choices are as multitudinous and as instantaneous as thoughts; but the thoughts of a single day no man can number, and yet conscience judges every choice, and all the secrets of the thoughts of the heart. A continuous evil predominant choice implies a continuous series of subsidiary evil choices; and so the evil choices of an evil man succeed each other with the rapidity of thought. It is the repetition of actions that makes them habitual. Repetition is the hammer which forges the chains of habit, and our own free choices wield the hammer. The supreme word of reason, therefore, speaking in the name of practical wisdom, is Now. The supreme word of conscience, speaking in the name of Eternal Right, is Now. The supreme word of the scientific school and of the Scriptural school in theology is To-day. The supreme word of the siren school of every form of false liberalism is To-morrow, a more convenient season, or possibly, the intermediate state. Incessant repetition of rebellious resolves in response to incessant solicitations from the divine voice of conscience must ultimately, under natural law, fix character in the sense of making its moral state permanent.

It is, however, my special office here to insist on the relations of religious truth to natural law; and therefore, I emphasize the fact that he who is incessantly saying, "I will not," while the Divine voice says, "Thou oughtest," is fixing his character under those mighty natural laws by which habit propagates itself, and by which sinning against light blinds us to the very illumination needed to rectify our condition. Hold unflinchingly to the first truths, the fundamental, primary religious verities, that similarity of feeling with God is necessary to peace in his presence, and that the longer we live in dissimilarity of feeling with Him, the longer we are likely to do so.—Joseph Cook.

THE MENNONITES.

The Mennonite reservation, east of the Red River and about twenty-five miles southeast of Winnipeg, is now as well populated as any district of the province of Manitoba, and the most recent immigration has been directed to a reservation of seventeen townships adjoining the frontier, and extending west of Red river to Pembina mountain. The settlement on the reservation first mentioned, called Rat river, consists of 650 families, and on the second reservation, called Dufferin, 450 families have been settled. In addition, thirty-three families have been settled near Scratching river, and the recent arrival of thirty-five families will go to Dufferin.

Estimating five to a family, the Mennonite settlements of Manitoba contain a population of 5,865, which will doubtless be increased steadily, but by no means with the volume of the past three years. The Mennonites who remain in Southern Russia, though inclined to emigrate in consequence of the termination of the stipulation exempting them from military services, are not prepared to sacrifice their possessions. When they can sell without disadvantage they emigrate. The exodus is, therefore, likely to be gradual, especially as the Russian government, while insisting on the right of conscription, assents readily to special assignments of service in deference to the Mennonite conscience—such as transportation, forestry and hospital service—very much as the Quakers of the United States during the late civil war were subjected to military service, but relieved from bearing arms.

The emigrating class of Lutheran Quakers, known as Mennonites, are neither the rich nor the poor, but are an intermediate body, who are, however, by no means destitute. Mr. Hespeler estimates that the sum brought into the province by the Mennonite immigration is $500,000, and the recently arrived thirty-five families have not less than $10,000,

There are Mennonite settlements in the Western States, but the land system there enforced does not admit of special reservations, and Manitoba has thus been enabled to present greater inducements for this class of settlers. Here the community can organize itself fully according to its traditions, including the rural village life of the dorf—or dorp, as we believe the word is Anglicised—a custom which has great merit socially and will warrant some fullness of detail.

A group of families—usually sixteen in number—take their homesteads separately, but proceed to throw them together, selecting the most desirable situation for a village or dorf, through which a street two chains wide is laid, and the plat divided into half acre lots, with assignments for church, school or other public use. A tract most suitable for tillage is then selected in a block, which is enclosed, and within which each head of a family cultivates that portion of his allotment—for there is no communism—that he finds convenient. A hay meadow, held also in severalty, is chosen, and the remainder of the consolidated homesteads is used as a range for cattle and other animals, which are invariably attended by a herdsman who is paid by the dorf. The village lots and other subdivisions are distributed by lot.

The houses—only found in the dorf—are comfortable, heated by central brick ovens, warming three or four rooms. The same roof usually extends over separate lodgings for cattle, although in this respect there is a growing tendency to have different tenements. Each family has a yoke of oxen, two cows and indefinite poultry. The pig is not wanting; and there are five hundred sheep and a hundred and fifty horses on the Rat River Reservation.

The municipal government is a simple democracy. The heads of families annually select a mayor or reeve, who is the chief executive officer, constantly conferring with his constituents. Over the whole community is a president or elder, selected for five years, and who, associated with the mayors of the dorfs, form a court for the final adjustment of all disputes and the enactment of all necessary ordinances. The president may act in all matters relating to a separate village in concurrence with the mayor thereof.

The church organization is quite distinct from the civil administration. The people elect a clergyman in each dorf, and a bishop to preside over the whole community for periods of five years. They receive no stipends. The teachers of the schools, one held in each village, are chosen by the people, but are paid a moderate compensation. Marriages are free; no allotment is made as formerly among the Moravians, and they are usually contracted early, the pair often remaining with the most prosperous of the parents for a year or two.

An admirable system of mutual insurance against fire prevails under a board of directors elected by the whole community. The insured are not restricted in amount, but contribute pro rata in case of any loss.

The mayor of a dorf, with two assistants, constitute an orphan court for the distribution of estates and the custody of the funds of orphans, for which the property of every villager is liable, deducting from the said orphan fund whatever contributions for the relief of the few destitute orphans may be found necessary.—Winnipeg (British Possessions) Standard.

Woman's Dethronement.—Whatever works toward destroying the home or detaching woman from the home idea, any unfitting her for the place in the home, any making her, through ease, selfishness or luxury, or curiosity of learning, or over esteem or ambitious rivalry of man, disloyal to the spirit and ministry of home is, practically, her dethronement, her degradation, overturning the settled order of the world and flouting the ordinances and decrees of God himself. And the true measure and glory of a woman is to order, comfort and adorn her home.—Dix.

It is true nobody was burned in the Salem witchcraft craze—but an old man of eighty died a worse death, by being very slowly pressed to death, in the horrible manner known to Old English Law. Witchcraft was a common superstition of the time. In Connecticut a reputed witch was pitched into the river to see if she would float; one was hanged to the yard-arm on an emigrant ship coming to Maryland, to silence the clamor of the crew; in North Carolina, one was put to death; while in an out of the way place in the State of New York it is said there was a mild witchcraft excitement in this very century.—The Century.

LITTLE HEADS TOGETHER.

NEVER MIND.

What's the use of always fretting
At the trials we shall find
Ever strewn along our pathway?
Travel on and never mind.

Travel onward—working, hoping—
Cast no lingering look behind
At the trials once encountered—
Look ahead and never mind.

And if those who might befriend you,
Whom the ties of nature bind,
Should refuse to do their duty,
Look to heaven and never mind.

Friendly words are often spoken
When the feelings are unkind;
Take them for their real value,
Pass them on and never mind.

Fate may threaten, clouds may lower,
Enemies may be combined;
If your trust in God is steadfast,
He will help you, never mind.

A STORY OF HAWAII.

BY EDNAH SHAW.

Many years ago the natives of the Sandwich Islands had a superstition that certain places or things were tabu, or sacred, and the penalty for touching the tabued article was death. They supposed if men did not kill whoever violated this law, the gods would do so. But when they saw foreigners disregard their notions and yet remain unharmed, they suddenly lost faith in the power of the gods, and gave up their system of tabu. However, there remained for some years a great fear of one goddess, Pele, who was supposed to inhabit the volcano of Kilauea. The natives had great reverence for this dread goddess, and threw into the crater of the volcano vast numbers of hogs, both cooked and alive as offerings to Pele.

Kapiolani was a chief's daughter and the wife of a governor of Hawaii. When the missionaries first knew her she had two husbands, and was said to be intemperate. Her heart was soon moved by the truth, and she built a church that the people might worship in comfort and quiet. Only five years after the missionaries landed and when but few of the natives believed the gospel, this woman determined to show them the utter folly of their fears about the goddess Pele. She resolved to walk over the mountain and thus prove the power of Pele to be simply nothing. Her husband and other friends sought to dissuade her, but she answered them: "If I am destroyed you may all believe in Pele." When a woman claiming to be a prophetess of Pele warned her not to approach the mountain without an offering, Kapiolani opened her Testament and read to her of the true God and Jesus as the Saviour of men. Down to the brink of the crater she went, eating some of the berries sacred to Pele, and threw stones into the flaming pit. Standing calmly there she said to the people who accompanied her, "Jehovah is my God. He kindled these fires. I fear not Pele. If I perish you may fear her power; but if Jehovah saves me now you must fear and serve him." She then called for the singing of a Christian hymn, a prayer was offered, and she went on her way. From this time till her death in 1841, she lived a brave and humble Christian life, honored by all who knew her.

This woman, in her ignorance and vice, was in the condition of untold multitudes who, to-day, wait in darkness for the rising of the Sun of righteousness. Who will go to carry the "good tidings of great joy?" Who will give "as God hath prospered," till the treasury shall be full and overflowing? Then the islands of the sea will soon be given to Christ, and the uttermost parts of the earth.

BAND OF HOPE BIBLE LESSON.

INTEMPERANCE.

Golden Text.—Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whosever is deceived thereby is not wise.—Prov. 20: 1.

Ques. 1. What is the subject of this lesson?

2. What is intemperance? The habitual use of intoxicating liquors is what we generally mean by the word, but the use of tobacco is a form of intemperance, and also eating or drinking more than we require, or is good for us.

3. Repeat the Golden Text,

4. What does it mean by "wine is a mocker"? "Mocker" means literally a "scorner"; i. e. men are made such by drinking it. They mock at the Bible and sacred things.

5. What does the Bible say about scorners? Prov. 13:1; 15: 12; 24: 9.

6. What does it mean by "strong drink is raging"? It means that it makes men so who use it. It takes away their senses and causes them to commit crime. Statistics show that more than eighty per cent of all our criminals are made such by the use of alcohol.

7. What is pronounced of the drunkard? Isaiah 5:11–22.

8. Name one effect of wine and strong drink. Isaiah28:7. It confuses the mind, and unfits those who use it to judge correctly in important matters. Doctors and lawyers who drink are not fit to be trusted with the lives of patients or the properties and rights of clients.

9. What does Solomon tell us not to do? Prov. 23: 31.

10. Why? Prov. 23: 32.

11. What does it mean by "biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder"? The drunkard is always miserable in mind and body. Drinking shortens life, poisons the brain and nervous system, and frequently causes delirium tremens.

12. If we refuse to touch or even look at what intoxicates are we in any danger of becoming drunkards?

13. Then is not God's rule a very wise and safe one?

14. What can no drunkard inherit? 1. Cor. 6: 10.

15. In view of these facts how ought we to feel towards the drunkard? We ought to pity him and do all we can for his reformation.

16. What practical truths do we draw from this lesson?

That the practice of drinking makes men mock at sin and despise God's word.

That it hurts the understanding and judgment.

That it finally kills the body.

That in the end it destroys the soul.

That total abstinence is the only safe rule.

That we must do all we can to induce those who drink to reform. E. E. Flagg.

5. BREAD. John 6.

I AM THE BREAD OF LIFE: HE THAT COMETH TO ME SHALL NEVER HUNGER: AND HE THAT BELIEVETH ON ME SHALL NEVER THIRST. John 6: 35.

1. Bread the staff of life. Isa. 3: 1; John 6: 51.

2. God's gift. Man cannot make one grain of corn. Matt. 6: 11; Psa. 65: 9; John 6: 32.

3. Corn passes through many processes in becoming bread. Isa. 28: 28, 29; 53: 5.

4. Bread must be eaten. John 6: 53–57; Jer. 15: 16.

5. It strengthens the body. Phil. 4: 13; Psa. 138: 3.

6. It becomes part of ourselves. Gal. 2: 20; Eph. 5: 30.

THE TIGER AND PANTHER OF THE INDIAN JUNGLE.

The tiger, the tyrant of the Indian jungle; has, as is due, the precedence over his feebler or less dreaded congeners. Skirting the base of the Himalayan range, extending east and west for many hundreds of miles, is a tract of land covered with jungle, called the Terai; this is his chosen home. Cradled in the long feathery grass of the jungle, he gambols about in his infancy playful as a kitten, and usually attains when full grown the length of nine or nine and a half feet. Wild hogs, deer, and all the larger species of game are his usual prey; but sometimes a pair of tigers will take up their abode within a mile of a village, sallying out from their lair every three or four days to pull down a bullock or a buffalo, always selecting the fattest in the herd. The strength of their muscular forearms is enormous. Captain Baldwin says: "I remember in Assam a tiger in the dead of night leaping over a fence nearly five feet high, seizing one of the largest oxen, and again leaping back, dragging the bullock after him across several fields and over two hedges." In his old age, when his teeth become worn, he not frequently becomes a man-eater; and such is the devastation he then occasions, that whole villages are sometimes deserted, and extensive districts laid waste from dread of these feline scourges. In these disastrous circumstances the advent of an English sportsman with his rifle and elephants is hailed as a god-send by the whole neighborhood. A tiger when brought to bay often "spit," exactly like a cat. Contrary to the received opinion, tigers seldom roar; but at night the forest resound with hideous din of their cries, which resemble the caterwauling of a whole squadron of gigantic Tomcats. In making a charge the tiger utters a series of short, vicious, coughing growls, as trying to the nerves as the most terrific roar. Tiger hunting, even from elephantback, is always accompanied with danger. One day when Captain Baldwin and a friend were out beating the bush for tigers, one of his beaters, a fine young man, "foolishly crept forward to try and discover the actual spot where the tiger was hiding. He must have approached within a few feet of the animal, for it struck but one blow without moving or exposing its body, and dashed the unfortunate man with great violence to the bottom of a stony ravine." He was rescued at once, but died the same evening, his skull having been fractured by the blow from the tiger's paw. In tiger shooting, when you discharge your piece, whether you hit or miss, you must not move, but, standing perfectly still, keep your eye on the animal and put in a fresh cartridge. Many lamentable accidents have occurred from sportsmen going rashly up to fallen tigers, erroneously supposing them to be dead. One or two stones should always be thrown first, to see what power of mischief is left in him, for it is quite possible that he may require another ball as a quietus. A tiger cannot climb trees, but he can spring to a considerable height, and this should be remembered in shooting them from what are called machans, a sort of framework of poles resting on the higher branches of a tree. An officer, some years ago, in Central India, got into a tree which overhung a watercourse to watch for tigers. He was a considerable way up the tree, but he did not advert to the fact that the high bank of the ravine behind him was almost on a level with him. In no long time a tiger came to drink, and he fired at and hit it but failed to kill it; when the enraged brute rushed up the bank to the higher ground behind, and springing upon him, dragged him out of the tree, and hit and tore him so frightfully that he died very soon after he was rescued. Powerful and ferocious as the tiger is he is afraid of the wild dog. A pack of these ravenous creatures, finding strength in their union, will set upon, kill, and devour a tiger. In the opinion of some old Indian sportsmen, the panther is even more to be dreaded than the tiger. He is a large, powerful, thoroughly ferocious brute. In old age he also sometimes takes to man-eating, but not so often as the tiger does. Our author, however, gives an instance "of one in Gwalior who had devoured over fifty human beings, and was the terror of the whole district." One evening Captain Baldwin, along with a friend, was perched in a tree in an open part of the jungle, near the carcass of a cow, which had been killed as was supposed by a tiger. The body was covered with birds of prey struggling and fighting over it like so many feathered demons, when suddenly a great commotion occurred among the noisy diners-out, and with a wish h-h of their heavy wings they left their dainty fare, and flew into the trees close by, making way as it appears for their betters, for very soon a huge brute approached the carcass, and began to tear and gnaw at the flesh. "A tiger?" whispered the Captain to his companion. "No; a very large panther," answered the other, firing as he spoke, but not killing the animal. In a minute he recovered himself, and, springing up, made straight for the tree. It was an ugly situation, for although a tiger cannot climb a tree, a panther can, as well as a cat. As he approached, another shot was fired at him which passed between his forelegs, and he paused and looked up. "Never," says our author, "shall I forget the devilish expression of that terrible countenance." An awful moment of suspense followed, during which Captain Baldwin contrived to give him his quietus.—Chambers' Journal.

A Bright Dog.—A friend of mine has a rough-haired collie, wise and exquisitely moddled. One evening a lady of the household, with whom he was a special favorite, stooped quietly, as he lay asleep on the rug, and placing her face close to his head blew sharply with a slight shout in one of his ears. Tickled and startled, he jumped up and moved off, seemingly offended. In the course of the evening the lady happened to be reclining in an easy chair, when the collie was observed by some of the inmates to rise, and make a circuit, to move stealthily toward the chair, put his fore paws on one of the arms, and, placing his nose close to the lady's ear, to give a sharp bark and instantly bound off.—Spectator.

TEMPERANCE.

The darkness of Germany on the temperance question may be inferred from the fact that the Moravian brethren carry on two breweries to help missions. The darkness of Britain has long been shown by the fact that eminent members of the benevolent and self-denying sect called "Friends" carry on immense breweries, and own hundreds, perhaps thousands, of beer-shops in London.

The Boston Congregationalist records as a significant fact that recently Major Burke, proprietor of the New Orleans Times Democrat, had the sporting news omitted one day in order to make room for a column on the organization of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Louisiana. But the next day 200 subscribers stopped the paper.

The suggestive fact is published by the Sunday School Times that in a certain manufacturing town an employer, on a recent Saturday, paid to his workmen $700 in crisp new bills that had been secretly marked. On Monday $450 of those identical bills were deposited in the bank by the saloon keepers. When the fact was made known, the workmen were so startled by it that they helped to make the place a no license town.

Governor Stanford has offered to purchase the entire town of Vina, Tehama county, Cal., on these conditions: He will buy all the real estate and improvements thereon for a nominal sum—say $1—and immediately sell and reconvey the same property to the owners, provided that he is allowed to insert a clause in his deeds that no intoxicating liquors shall ever be sold in the town of Vina. He will further obligate himself to build a fine two-story school-house, large enough to accommodate all the children of the town. He will agree to import 100 German families to work his extensive vineyard and orchard, and will exclude from his premises all Chinese labor.

Mr. Joseph Cook, in a recent lecture, said: "When the present Emperor dies there will come to the throne in the German Empire a man of most liberal opinions in theology. The Crown Prince is not a rationalist. I do not regard him as an opponent to Christianity; but he is married to a daughter of Queen Victoria, who thinks that any man who believes in miracles is either a hypocrite or a fool. She was a pupil of Strauss. One of the first important remarks I heard on going to Germany nine years ago—and the sentence came from no less a man than Professor Tholuck—was that the Crown Prince had married a woman of frivolous opinions in theology, and that great harm might ultimately come to the Empire from her being a pupil of Strauss, the author of the mythical theory. A similar opinion I met often on a recent tour to six of the foremost German cities and universities."

ard, in his life and in his death! Millions of children in Pennsylvania will be educated, without knowing that they are indebted to Mr. Stevens for the schools where they are taught. While negleeting personal religion himself, he educated pious and exeellent young men in eollege. When Mr. Webster, onee his politieal idol, made his eelebrated pro-slavery speeeh, he compared him to Pope's deseription of Lord Baeon:

"The wisest, brightest, meanest of mankind."

When poor Mr. Seward went with Andrew Johnson to aid Freemasonry in laying the eorner-stone of Douglas' monument at Chieago, he, in his plaee in the House of Representatives, ridiculed the two as a pair of aged clowns in a traveling eircus. He had bought a lot in a eemetery here, but would not be buried in it when he found colored people were exeluded.

When I said to him. "Mr. Stevens, do you love the Lord Jesus Christ any? Do you plaee any trust in him?" Though weak and under the power of medicine, he roused himself, and with his former energy of tone and manner, replied: "Well! when one sees his truthfulness; for he was the Truth, not to love him would be to be a wreteh! But for myself I must leave that—" and his voice subsided into silence.

When "the dead are judged out of those things written in the books, according to their works," haply it will be found there recorded: "And he did that which was right in the sight of the Lord." And if the colored people on this continent ever erect monuments, their tallest one belongs to him. Among his last words to me, alluding to the murder of Morgan, he said, "And the lodge is no better now than it was then." And his abhorrence of the lodge will yet be as popular, as his views of slavery are now.

—Father Leuty, who left Chicago for Iowa and Kansas a short time ago, visited friends in Clarence and was last week in College Springs, Iowa, where he found an agreeable people, a quiet town, good farms and religious privileges, and was so well pleased that he thinks seriously of taking up a residence there.

—The Franklin Repository, Chambersburg, Pa., of Mar. 20, contains the following notice of the visit of President Blanchard to that city:

"President J. Blanchard, of Wheaton College, editor of the Christian Cynosure, Chicago, will preach at King street United Brethren church, Chambersburg, next Sabbath, (March 25th.) This distinguished educator, minister, and reformer is a man of national reputation, and is now at Washington, D. C., giving attention to the great problems pertaining to the morals and religion of the nation. Forty years ago he came to Chambersburg by advice of Thaddeus Stevens to lecture against slavery, and while a guest at Noel's hotel, was threatened by a large and angry mob which surrounded the hotel. He was providentially delivered from the danger. He has ever been a leading reformer on all subjects, no matter how unpopular at first. The public are invited to hear this venerable Christian gentleman. Quarterly meeting and communion services will be held at King street next Sabbath."

—A note from friends in Brush Creek, Iowa, informs us that Elder Rathbun spoke there Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, Mar. 20 and 21, to large and attentive audiences. His next appointment was at West Union.

—Bro. C. D. Trumbull says that arrangements are definitely made for a debate in Morning Star, Iowa, on Freemasonry. Rev. F. W. Evans, of the Methodist church, Oskaloosa, has agreed to meet Elder Rathbun, April 10th. Mr. Evans wants a four days debate, two sessions a day of two hours each, each speaker to occupy a half hour at a time. These arrangements are agreed to, and the question is stated thus: "Resolved That Freemasonry is anti-Christian and anti-republican." It is expected that this debate will be of unusual interest.

—A brief note from Mr. R. H. Chittenden, of Lyndon, Kans., tells us that our dear friend, his father, Linus Chittenden, has passed from this life to the joyful presence of his God and Saviour. He was nearly 81 years old, and his death was peacefully triumphant. His gentle, earnest, loving spirit will often be remembered in Northern Illinois. God grant to raise up through his testimony many young men who shall carry on the good fight he helped begin.

—Guizot, the eminent writer of France, says: "In order to make popular education truly good, and socially useful, it must be fundamentally religious. . . . . It is necessary that national education should be given and received in the midst of a religious atmosphere, and that religious impressions and religious observances should penetrate into all its parts. Religion is not a study nor an exercise to be restricted to a certain plaee or a certain hour; it is a faith and a law which ought to be felt everywhere, and which after this manner alone can exercise all its beneficial influence upon our mind and our lives."

American Politics.

NOMINATIONS FOR 1884.

For President,
JONATHAN BLANCHARD
OF ILLINOIS.

For Vice President,
JOHN A. CONANT,
OF CONNECTICUT.

PLATFORM.

We hold: 1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That God requires and man needs a Sabbath.

3. That the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is the true policy on the temperance question.

4. That the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

5. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by articles 13th, 14th and 15th of our amended Constitution should be preserved inviolate.

6. That arbitration of differences with nations is the most direct and sure method of securing and perpetuating a permanent peace.

7. That to cultivate the intellect without improving the morals of men, is to make mere adepts and experts; therefore, the Bible should be associated with book of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

8. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

9. That the government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

10. That maintenance of the public credit, protection to all loyal citizens, and justice to Indians are essential to the honor and safety of our nation.

11. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice-president of the United States.

THADDEUS STEVENS.

ON THE NOMINATION OF NATIONAL ANTI-MASONIC CANDIDATES.

[Speech before the National Convention of 1830, in Philadelphia.]

It is known to many, and I aver, that, though I believe Masonry to be injurious to the cause of religion, it is also made to operate with more peculiar force upon our political institutions, and we have therefore a right to submit the subject to the people for their direction. I know of but one way that they can fairly express their sentiments, and that is, by the elective franchise

If we take this course, I know it will be said that this is a political convention. This will be the clamor of our opponents; but I regard their clamor as I would regard the idle winds. We are to be governed by what we believe to be the will of our constituents. We should take counsel of our friends, and not of those who are arrayed in hostility against us.

Now, although this convention is not strictly for political purposes alone, yet, in my humble estimation, there is no way by which you can make the Masonic fraternity feel and tremble, except through the medium of the elections. If we come here for the purpose of discussing and developing Freemasonry, without taking some effective measures to enforce upon that institution the results of our examinations, we shall place ourselves in a situation to merit the contempt of the public.

Now, this resolution is simply to inquire whether it is expedient to proceed to the nomination, etc.; and it was hardly expected that this would be met at the very threshhold in this way. And I ask, how are you to disseminate Anti-masonry, except through some such common medium? I admit you may extend it slowly—some remote brethren may pick up a stray newspaper occasionally, in which there may be some vague hints upon the subject; but few, very few, of all our citizens would know for years, that such a question has been here agitated; for the press is muzzled; it is closed. But nominate a candidate for President, and call him the Anti-masonic candidate, and it is a question which will interest every man, from North to South.

Even those high dignitaries, kings and princes, and royal companions in this country, will thenfind it incumbent on them to meet the opposition; to sustain their institution, or fall before tne march of their opposers.

Our citizens at the West, knowing that there are two great presidential candidates before the people, will enlist themselves under the banners of one or the other of the two candidates. But if you reject the resolution now before you, you shut out all inquiry as to the propriety of a nomination at all; and the people of the United States will say, "the Anti-masonic Convention have virtually decided that they have not the right to interfere with that nomination;" and what would be the effect of such a course?

On the other hand, if the nomination be made, all the people who are not now Anti-masons, would no longer have any inducement to suspend their decision; for they will espouse the cause of one or the other; their feelings will become warmed and interested on one or the other side. But if at some future time you attempt to introduce Anti-masonry, the opposite party will say, that the feelings of the people are pre-engaged, and the progress of Anti-masonry will stop till the next contest has gone by. In my estimation it is important that a committee should report upon the subject.

If we hold to the idea, that no nomination is to be made, and that we are carrying on Anti-masonry for the furtherance of a mere State contest, and that there is no higher object here or in any other part of the government, we have not only done nothing, but far worse than nothing—for we shall have shown that we do not intend to eradicate the evil, but to punish the sins of it in certain states, and upon certain individuals.

All who embark in this cause, should consider that Freemasonry contains principles which unfit any man to fulfil the high trusts of the government. On that principle we should act throughout.

THE MASONIC CANDIDATE AND HIS PROSPECTS.

Recognizing Gen. Butler of Massachuseets as the regular Masonic candidate for the Presidency, it is well to examine into his claims for that office. His chief service rendered to the country consists in having established, together with Generals Sickles and Logan, a great holiday, called decoration day. The day, it is true, has not become one of national observance, and never can be; nor in fact have any of the General's services ever been national, but only partisan. The General is Mason first, Democrat second, and Butler always.

The real value of decoration day consists in its peculiar fitness for getting fraudulent pensions. It is a Masonic machine admirably contrived for that purpose, under the pretence of a great good aiming at a great bad. But it is likely to be a powerful aid to the political prospects of the General. There must be at least two millions of voters of both the government and rebel armies, or Federal and Confederates as they are called, the greater part of which would vote for a pension. These voters added to the Democratic party would pretty certainly give the General the election. He has things at last right where he would like to have them. Observer.

What's in a Name?—Names of persons were originally descriptive of character, incidents in life, or birth, or something of the kind. If it were customary now-a-days to make names descriptive, the class of men known as Knights Templar would properly be called Knights Tippler. It would hardly seem proper to elevate a man of such a title to the Presidency of the United States.

The Churches.

—Rev. A. J. Chittenden is expected to preach in the College chapel, Wheaton, on next Lord's day.

—Rev. A. Ethredge, formerly of Marseilles, Ill., and by whose efforts largely that town was redeemed from saloon power, is now preaching for the Tonica brethren.

—The meetings in Montrose, Iowa, conducted by Bro. Ronayne, continued from the 10th to the 27th ult., being held afternoon and evening. A good attendance, he writes, was maintained, and a number professed salvation through Christ. He expected, on leaving Montrose, to visit Charleston and Donaldson before going to Birmingham.

—The United Brethren in Christ and the Daily Herald of Chambersburg, Pa., speak in warmest terms of the visit of President Blanchard to that city last week. He preached twice in the King St. church on Sabbath, Mar. 25, and on Tuesday evening addressed a large meeting in the court house upon the issues presented to American voters in the American platform.

—In the congregation of the Westminster church, Chicago, Rev. E. C. Oggel, pastor, twenty new members were received into the fellowship lately of the church, all for the first time confessing their Lord. George Williams, the converted actor, was present, and, as the occasion was the eighth anniversary of his conversion, the services were of more than ordinary interest.

—The relation of Freemasonry to practical Christianity is seen in the following statistics of the religious condition of Boston in 1826. At no time before or since has Masonry ever had so strong a grasp on the people as it had just before the Morgan revelation and abduction; and at no time was orthodox Christianity in Boston so low. Of the 44 places of worship at that time 12 were Unitarian, 7 Orthodox Congregational, 4 Episcopal, 4 Baptists, 4 Mission chapels, 5 Methodists, 3 Universalists, 2 Catholic, 2 Christian and 1 Presbyterian. One of the Episcopal, one of the Baptist, and both Christian churches were Unitarian, so that 16 out of 42 Protestant churches were Unitarian, and three were Universalists.

—The growing Russian influence in Bulgaria is adverse to evangelical missionary work. The school of the American Board at Samokov has been seriously interrupted, and a report has reached Europe that the Government has closed the schools of the Methodist mission.

—The Christian Advocate of New York announced last week: The Rev. P. R. Hawxhurst, pastor of Central Church, Yonkers, has received on probation a lady aged 100 years and 4 months. Her intellect is clear, sight good, hearing dull; but the goodness and long suffering of God have led her to repentance.

—The closing exercises of the Reformed Presbyterian Theological Seminary took place in Seminary Hall, Allegheny City, March 20th. There were seventeen students in the institution this session. Professors Sproull, Sloane and Wilson made reports of the work of the year, which were quite satisfactory.

—Rev. J. C. Armstrong, employed by the Chicago Congregational churches as city missionary, says there are 90,000 children connected with the Sabbath-schools of that denomination in the city, and the history of a number of churches shows that they had originated in mission Sabbath-schools.

—Much interest is felt in Washington City in the McAll Mission in Paris. A large meeting was held recently to further the objects of the cause. The friends of the mission propose to give it a more systematic character, and for this purpose favor a national organization which shall have the work in charge. One scheme proposed is to have a president and an executive committe of twelve. of whom eight shall be residents of Philadelphia, and the others representatives of Washington, Brooklyn, Syracuse,. and other cities which take especial interest in the work.

—The special committee of the American Board of Missions has invited President Chapin, of Beloit College, and Professor Mead, who is now in Germany, to act as a visiting deputation to the Western Turkey Mission.

—The Rev. Dr. J. M. Scudder, of Vellore, India, wishes that every missionary in that land were a medical man, and urges the home societies not to send out any workers who have not, at least, a slight knowledge of medicine. He visited two towns for several years in succession without gaining the least hold, apparently, upon the people, when a slight surgical service on his part opened both their hearts and homes. It also opened his eyes to the value of medical knowledge.

JOSEPH COOK ON MR. MOODY'S WORK.

Mr. Moody's revivals, I believe, have turned out thoroughly well in every case where they have followed up properly. On both sides of the Atlantic I have watched public sentiment concerning his work. I confess that I am one of his most earnest admirers. I offer prayer every day of my life that God will pour out upon his labors blessing above all that I can ask or think. A few men say, his work here or there has not eventuated well. Did the pastors follow it up? Was the seed deeply planted before he came? He is nothing but the shower, he is nothing but the opening in the clouds. God seems to speak through some evangelists, he gives them power to open the heavens and let the sunlight in upon spiritual fields. By endowment of heaven, this capacity was in Edwards, it was in Whitefield, it was in Wesley and Finney and it is in many an evangelist of to-day, thank God; but we must remember that the planting of the seed and the attending of the green shoots are quite as important as allowing the sunlight and the rain to fall upon the fields. In this city I happen to know that certain revered pastors who sit on the platform at this moment, and whom I must not name, have followed up carefully the converts who came forward in their fields of labor, in Mr. Moody's revival, and that if you go to these pastors and ask what has been the result of Mr. Moody's efforts here, they will say it has been glorious. In two or three instances reformed drunkards have become large benefactors of the churches, both spiritually and financially. The men who have followed up these converts give you a good report of Mr. Moody's work, but the men who folded their hands, the men who said, "Let the harvest take care of itself," the men who were immersed in luxurious lives and had torpid congregations, and who did not care to soil the skirts of their churches with any acquisitions from unpopular portions of our masses,—these persons, if you approach them, have usually, only a cold answer to give to any question as to the effect of Mr. Moody's work here. I care nothing for the answer of such men. I repudiate such men as authorities concerning this work. Greatly as we in America revere Mr. Moody's work, I found in Edindurgh deeper reverence for it than I find, on the whole, in Boston. I found in London, on the whole, higher esteem for it than I have been able to find, usually in New York. On both sides of the Atlantic, wherever I have been in fields he has visited, I have had abundant proof that his work, when followed up by the local pastors, has eventuated successfully. Look at Oxford! Were not the young men reached there? Why were they reached? Chiefly because God's truth was boldly preached and made fruitful by his Spirit; but partly, also, because Mr. Moody's hands were held up in part by men of position in the Established church. Were his hands held up here? Did Harvard professors stand by him here as Oxford professors stood by him in the British Islands, as Edinburgh professors stood by him in Scotland? I happen to know a dozen glorious men of learning who thought it an honor to go into the inquiry meetings und converse with the religiously irresolute in Edinburgh [applause] and in London [applause].—Joseph Cook.

THE FARM.

AN EARLY CROP OF PEAS.

There are two distinct classes of peas, those with small round seeds, and others with much larger, irregularly-shaped peas, the surface of which is wrinkled. The wrinkled seeded, or marrow peas, are as much better than the others as sweet corn is superior to field corn. The round peas, while not so good, are much hardier and earlier than the others. Unless the soil is warm and they germinate quickly, wrinkled peas will decay before they can come up. The round peas are vastly better than no peas, and are very acceptable until the others come. To have early peas they must be sown early—the earlier the better. After the soil has thawed for the first four inches, even if it is solid below, sow peas. If the ground was manured and ploughed last autumn, all the better; if not, select the richest available spot, and open a drill four inches deep. Peas should be covered deeper than most other seeds. For varieties the "Early Kent" is one of the best; it has almost as many names as there are dealers. "Daniel O'Rourke" is one of the names of a good strain of this pea. "Carter's First Crop" is another good variety, and every spring new extra early sorts are sent from England, which usually turn out to be the old "Early Kent" with a new name. The peas should be sown in the bottom of the drill rather thickly, at least one every inch, and at first covered with about an inch of soil. It is well to put about four inches of coarse stable manure over the rows; this is to be left on in cold days, but when it is sunny and warm, pull it off with the rake and let the sun strike the soil over the peas, replacing it at night. When the peas sprout, gradually cover them with fine warm soil, placing the coarse manure over them as needed, until the covering of soil reaches the level of the surface. If a ridge of soil, a few inches higher than the peas, be drawn up on each side of the row, it will greatly protect them from cold winds. When the plants are a few inches high, draw some fine soil up to them, and stick in the brush. When the soil becomes dry and warm, the main crop of wrinkled peas may be sown.—American Agriculturist.

APRIL FARM NOTES.

A well started crop is usually profitable, and one put in late or under unfavorable conditions is seldom satisfactory.

Harrowing winter grain is a practice that is now quite generally adopted by the better farmers. This should be done with implements that have the teeth turned backward. Peruvian guano, bone-dust, wood-ashes, or other fertilizer may be applied before the harrowing.

Spring wheat should be sown as soon as the ground can be properly prepared. A top-dressing of manure may be added after sowing. The good effect of a soluble fertilizer can sometimes be seen in a few hours, especially if the application is soon followed by a gentle shower that takes the substance down to the roots. Any start given to young plants is felt for good throughout their whole life. In using any concentrated fertilizer, care must be taken that it does not come in contact with seeds. If scattered thoroughly and thinly on the surface after sowing there is no danger, otherwise it should be mixed with the soil.

Fodder Crops.—There should be ample provision of food for farm animals during the summer months, when the pastures are short from drouth. A leafy sort of oats may be sown with peas and thus obtain a double crop of green fodder. The value of Hungarian grass as a supply of good green food, is not easily overestimated.

Beets, including mangels, may be sown the last of the month. Quick starting of the seeds may be insured by soaking them. They should be sown so soon as germination begins. After the plants are up they will need weeding and thinning.

Grass is a leading farm crop, and is much neglected. Our farmers have given very little attention to the study of grass and the soils and culture best adapted to the various sorts. A permanent meadow or pasture needs to be kept up by a yearly top-dressing of manure or commercial fertilizer. It is hoped that the American farmer will come to a better understanding of the importance of grass growing, and that our grass land will be treated with due consideration.

Potatoes.—The potato-beetle is well under control, and potatoes are now a certain crop, and a profitable one when given clean culture on a rich mellow soil. It is well to plant early sorts and harvest the tubers before the "rot" has time to reach them.

Sundry Matters.—Put all farm implements in good order during rainy days. Clear up the rubbish that has accumulated. Look well to fences before cattle are turned out.

Sheep.—The care bestowed on sheep by some farmers during the winter, invites weakness, and a troublesome irritation of the skin and loss of wool often follow poor treatment. Raising lambs for the spring market is a profitable business, but great care of both ewes and lambs is necessary. The strength and vitality of the lamb after birth depend largely on the condition of the ewe previous to parturition. Much injury is done to the unborn lambs by compelling the ewes to go without water. Licking the snow to quench thirst chills the fœtus and weakens the lamb, even if more serious results do not follow.—American Agriculturist for April.

A LIFE DOUBLY ASSURED.

A resident of Bangor, Maine, writing to C. N. Crittenton, New York, for a supply of Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar, mentions incidentally that three months ago a New England life-insurance company refused to grant him a policy on the ground that he was consumptive. "But," he adds, "thanks to the healing properties of that invaluable preparation, my lungs are now perfectly sound, and I yesterday passed a medical examination without an objection, and insured my life for $5,000." Of druggists generally.

A pure, radient complexion is one of woman's greatest charms. It is attainable by the daily use of Glenn's Sulphur Soap, which removes blemishes of the skin, cuticular ailments of every description, and is an admirable disinfectant.

PREVENTIVE OF MALARIAL DISEASES.

Opinion of Eminent Dr. H. R. Walton, of Annapolis, Md.

"Colden's Liquid Beef Tonic is a most excellent preparation. It is, par excellence, superior to cod-liver oil or anything I have ever used in wasted or impaired constitutions, and extremely beneficial as a preventive of malarial diseases." (Remember the name, Colden's—take no other) Of druggists generally.

DR. JOHN BULL'S

FEVER and AGUE

Or CHILLS and FEVER.

AND ALL MALARIAL DISEASES.

The proprietor of this celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE, CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. He refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to cure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and whole families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the general health. It is, however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medicine will not require any aid to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

The genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN J. SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP, of Louisville, Ky. Examine well the label on each bottle. If my private stamp is not on each bottle do not purchase, or you will be deceived.

The stylographic pen is one of the necessaries of our modern civilization. If Hood's song had been "Dip, dip, dip," instead of "Stitch, stitch, stitch," it would have lost its text at the hands of Mr. Livermore, who has given his age this perfection of pen, penholder, and case, and ink, all in one, handsome, and always at hand and ready for use. The inventor has put some new improvements into it, and now what remains but for every scribe and letter writer to find it on his desk. Ink, filler and cleaner, all go with it. And to crown all, the price has been reduced to $2. Send that amount to the sole agent, Mr. Louis E. Dunlap, 290 Washington St., Boston, Mass., and the return mail will bring you this most perfect pen.—Contributor, Boston, Mass.

THE COMING CONFLICT.

A NEW AND RAPIDLY SELLING BOOK IN OPPOSITION TO FREE-MASONRY.

We desire to call your attention to this useful work, and ask you to help us in its circulation. We want Agents to canvass every community.

By selling this book one can do much good. It is by such literature that we must expect to awaken a popular sentiment against secret societies, and overthrow them. By selling this book one can make money. Liberal terms will be allowed, and any energetic Agent can sell many copies. Masons will buy it from mere curiosity. Anti-Masons will buy it for the facts and arguments presented. Many will buy it to send to their neighbors. Those on the fence will buy it that they may learn the truth on the subject. Those not interested in the discussion, and young people especially, will buy it for the story.

"A book which we trust may have a wide circulation."—National Baptist, (Philadelphia.)

"It is an attack on Freemasonry with a sprinkle of Slavery thrown in to make it go down well."—A. R. Presbyterian, (S. C.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of the best class of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D. D., in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia, Pa.)

"A charming work fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.'"—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ill.)

The book is neatly and plainly printed, handsomely bound, 352 pages, thick paper. A specimen copy sent to any one contemplating accepting an agency for $1.10.

Single copy $1.50; Per Dozen, $15.00.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his name to the letter, but attaches his affidavit to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

BUSINESS.

TRIAL SUBSCRIBERS.

The few hundreds who have received and read the Cynosure on the four weeks Trial list, may safely reckon that the best is yet in reserve, and they should be careful not to miss a single number, by neglecting to forward their subscriptions for a year in time to avoid a break. Our back numbers have been so reduced by calls for specials that we can promise no back numbers, and you should be sure to keep the connection.

We are on the eve of a struggle which is to determine who shall rule and administer our government. Whether secret rings and cliques all centering in Freemasonry shall connive at the crimes of oath-bound confederates, or open courts with lawful oaths shall assure rights at all, on the plane of equality and law.

FREE to every Reader OF THIS Advertisement, A SPLENDID TIMEKEEPER.

In order to advertise HOUSE AND HOME, and secure subscribers promptly, we have decided to make the following most princely and magnificent offer to each and every reader of this paper. It is the common practice of the gold and silver refiners of England and Switzerland to purchase from the pawnbrokers of their respective countries all the gold and silver watches which have been unredeemed, simply for the sake of the gold and silver cases. The works are then sold to a celebrated watch firm who have made a speciality of this business. The firm places the works in the hands of skillful workmen, who set to work and put them in as good condition as possible. These works embrace every variety of movement, some of them being very fine and perfect timekeepers, all handsomely cased. We have just purchased the entire stock (25,000) of a bankrupt concern of the above described watches at less than the first cost of the raw material.

On receipt of $1.50, the subscription price of House and Home, and $1.00 extra to pay for packing, postage, and registering, we will send House and Home for one year (52 numbers), and one of these watches, POSTPAID, to any address in the United States. Watches mailed the day the order is received. The watches were purchased specially to go with House and Home, and will be furnished only to subscribers to that publication. In order to introduce it at once we make this unusual offer, which could not be made were it not for the fact that we bought the watches at one-quarter cost of manufacture.

On receipt of 50 cents extra we will send our new and elegant watch-chain, with a Whistle Charm and Dog Call Attachment—just the thing for hunters and sporting men.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

The municipal election in Chicago last week resulted in a surprise to many citizens. An independent movement led by some of our best citizens began the agitation for a change of city officers and the suppression of the vile dens of sin that have flourished under the rule of Harrison during the two terms in which he has served as mayor. The Republicans united with the movement; every English daily but one helped it on heartily; all the Protestant clergymen seemed to speak with one voice in denunciation of the prevailing iniquity and its license by the mayor, and urged their congregations to do their duty; and political clubs and private citizens offered large rewards for the detection of illegal voting. Notwithstanding all, the gamblers, saloonists, thieves and keepers of dens of prostitution triumphed and Chicago decided by over 10,000 majority to take two years more of demagogue and bummer rule. The picture is an unpleasant one for people who are so glad that the world is getting better every year.

The view taken of the Chicago election by the press of the country shows that the result will be almost as damaging to the business interests of the city as the great fire, and that in the world's estimate of her morals the city is already near the level of Sodom. Our own daily press has been seconded by the pulpit in declaring the city administration as of the most desperate character. On the Sabbath before the election every Protestant pulpit of prominence became for the hour a political rostrum from whence were heard vehement denunciations while the pastors earnestly exhorted every voter to be faithful to his professions of morality and piety. Dr. Kittridge, the leading Presbyterian clergyman, published Harrison in the papers as an outright liar and unscrupulous demagogue. These respected pastors and editors are doubtless right in their fearful characterization of the Harrison administration, but there is one element of it that has escaped their notice—or else they have wilfully overlooked it. Harrison himself is well known to be a high Mason. It is well known also that Theodore T. Gurney, who as comptroller is second in authority, is a 33-degree Mason and Past Grand Master of the State of two terms; and also that Dewitt C. Cregier, commissioner of public works and city engineer, third in authority, is also a 33-degree Mason and Past Grand Master of two terms. It thus appears that the administration of which there is such reasonable and universal complaint is Masonic from root to branch. Probably no city on the continent was ever governed by so much Masonry; and a just and natural inference is, that the principles of the lodge, which are most active in the representatives of municipal authority, are responsible for the notorious and detestible condition of Chicago's morality. This city has had one immense fraud perpetrated upon her by the Knight Templar Masons; her citizens, if they would but make proper inquiry, would learn that the imposition of the conclave of 1880 is a trifle compared with the aggregate of evil they suffer from the lodge.

The election of Ben. Butler as governor of Massachusetts was the greatest political joke in our history. It was the give-the-old-fellow-a-chance voters that elected him, after being for years amused by his perseverance in asking for the office, no less than by his eccentricties in Congress and the army. It is possible they will repent of their experiment; but whether so or not, they have secured an exhibition of the qualities of Freemasonry when masked behind a State executive. Men look on doubting like Red Riding Hood when she saw the wolf's nose peeking from her grandmother's cap. We have, for instance, one day word of Butler's marching into a Masonic ball with his executive staff in procession with "Grand Commanders" and "Sovereign Grand Commanders," each at the head of a company of satellites. Next day it is said that we hear as much about him as an attorney as a governor, and that one of his clients, a distiller charged with fraud, is acquitted. Annual Fast day approaches and he proclaims to the preachers to preach the Gospel and let public evils (i. e. politics) alone. Again note is made that he has vetoed nearly all the acts of the Massachusetts legislature, and has been severely handled in a committee report. Now when a governor thinks it necessary for a great State to be represented officially and with dignity at a lodge dance, it may be one way of teaching the people of the glory and exaltation of Freemasonry, or it may not. And when a high Mason, who thinks well of his title of "Sovereign Grand Inspector General," has the power, and uses it, of thwarting the representatives of a State in their endeavor to manage its business and make its laws, he is proving to us how delightful and peaceful the condition of a land where Freemasonry overrides every other interest. If they are not convinced that this is the case, they will at least become familiar with their yoke, and less liable to make trouble when the wolf throws off his disguise.

The Nihilists are making their power felt once more, as the arrangements for the coronation of the Czar in Moscow are begun. They have proclaimed their intention with a ferocious audacity and warn the people to keep at a distance from the object of their hate on the occasion. A telegram from Moscow makes the startling announcement that a large mine has been discovered connecting with the Kremlin where the coronation of the Czar is to take place. It is also stated that a request has been wired to St. Petersburg for one hundred sappers to be sent at once to Moscow for the purpose of destroying the mine. The police also are said to be demoralized by these discoveries, and ask for an indefinite postponement of the ceremony. The leaders of these dark and secret attacks upon the Russian government ask only that its head grant a constitution before it takes the crown, and their opposition will cease. But it is a question which they seem not to have considered, what value could be put upon a constitution obtained by terror and assassination? How could it bind a prince, any more than an oath extorted at the sword's point by a gang of Knight Templar Freemasons could bind a candidate, or that exacted by a gang of robbers could bind their victim?

While mines are opening in Russia the English police are stumbling upon factories and magazines of dynamite in London and Birmingham whose surroundings are sufficiently alarming for any "Invincible." The Birmingham factory was masked in a careful and scientific manner and the operations were carried on by men expert in chemistry. Their object is believed to be plain from the fact that in the establishment was found a peculiar explosive compound which is never used in legitimate business. The excitement in England is so great that several prominent Irishmen have publicly repudiated the business in the name of their countrymen and the American minister, Lowell, has felt called upon to explain that in this country these secret society plots are not looked upon as of the nature of war.

MASONIC TESTIMONY.

BY REV. WM. JOHNSTON.

A friend has just put into my hands a copy of the Masonic Chronicle, a journal in the interests of Masonry, published at Columbus, Ohio. The opening article is by Frank W. Baxter, under the heading, "Proclaim the Truth to All." He deals in the usual laudations of Masonry of course, and represents its opposers as ignorant, false, perjured, fanatical demagogues, and political shysters. Of these things it is not necessary to take more than a passing notice.

My present purpose is to present some of the writer's positions, and give a few comments.

He says: "One of the first truths that the neophyte must give his assent to, is a belief in an ever living and true God, without which no man, whether he be possessed of the wealth of a Croesus, or the talent of a Cicero, or the power of the most powerful king the earth ever produced, cannot enter."

In another connection he maintains that this law and its enforcement is enough to silence the charge that the order is unchristian.

Now the ever living and true God, we take to be the God of the Bible; and I apprehend some Masons will take it as a huge joke, that the law of Masonry enforces a belief in the God of the Bible. We know there are Masons and Odd-fellows both, who out of the lodge laugh at the God of the Bible; and if, in the lodge, they profess their faith in him, there is a bare possibility that some others may be perjured besides those who have renounced Masonry.

Besides, as I showed in a recent article, that word God in the mouths of some people may be made to mean almost anything, and the acknowledgement of a God, is no evidence that a Mason believes in the ever living and true God. And further, though a man did acknowledge the God of the Bible, and yet denied his Son, would he be worthy to be accounted Christian? If so, then might we call them Christians who crucified the Lord of glory. There were men in Jerusalem who could vociferously cry, "Hear, oh Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord," and yet with the same breath could cry—"Crucify him, crucify him." Masonry rejects Christ, and is therefore unchristian.

Again, this apostle of truth says, "Masonry is the promulgator of peace and good will toward all men; not strife, envy, or discord."

Rise up Rathbun and speak. Tell us something about that "little sweetness" at Kellerton, and various other points where Masonic "righteousness and peace kissed mutually." Come forth Starry and Lowe, and other "perjured villains," "fanatical demagogues" and "ranting political shysters," and tell us what you know of Masonic love and goodwill toward all men, yourselves not excepted. Let even the sedate Hinman and the serene Stoddard lift up their voices and tell us if they have always been met in a spirit of peace and goodwill by those whose innocence is symbolized by the lambskin, and whose lives are regulated by the compass and the square. Well, may be that was only another joke, and we will pass on.

Furthermore the apostle of truth does solemnly testify—"Masonry never enters the political arena."

No, I suppose not. As we read the story of the olden time, the Greek soldiers did not first enter Troy in regular battalions, with drawn swords and streaming banners, but in the "ventrum" of a wooden horse. Masons do not enter the political arena as plumed knights, with their lambskin aprons and all the emblazonry of the order; but they have a kind of Masonic horse, by which they gain admission to conventions and courts, and halls of legislation; and that Masonic horse may yet prove as fatal to our free institutions, as did the Trojan horse to the ancient kingdom of Priam. When the legislature of Indiana made an appropriation to a State institution, conditioned on the faculty rescinding their action forbidding secret orders among the students, it gives occasion for a grave suspicion that a Masonic horse had something to do with the matter. I greatly admire the pluck of President White, who it is said has resigned, rather than fall down on his knees and cry, "Great is the Masonic horse."

But hear this evangelist of the new gospel of peace and goodwill glorify the strength of the fraternal bond that binds Masons together. He finds forcible illustrations in the history of our late civil war. Says he, "Numerous instances are on record, where the brother recognized the brother in the very heat of battle. Life was spared and the survivers blessed the day, when they united with a brotherhood that knew no distinction of party, class, creed or power."

Yes, in the days of the civil war some of us kept telling you some of these things, and you said we lied. There were indications that not only those who carried the musket, but also some who rode on horses "clothed with rich caparison" and wore the bands or stars, recognised the talismanic sign amid the "heat of battle," and allowed victory to be snatched out of their hands or turned to defeat. In those days, I heard men who never attended an Anti-masonic convention give utterance to their suspicions, that this influence greatly protracted the war and increased the sacrifice of blood and treasure. And the thought has struck me very forcibly, that when gentlemen of the lambskin fraternity make such admissions as the above, they should not get into a passion, when Anti-masons gently whisper, "Murder and treason not excepted."

But I dismiss this new chapter in the gospel of truth, and close my commentary.

In the light of a Mason's own testimony shall we now sing—

"Hail Masonry divine,"

or

"All hail the power of Jesus' name;"

and again with us old psalm-singers,

"Kiss ye the Son, lest in his ire
Ye perish from the way,
If once his wrath begin to burn,
Blest all that on him stay."

FRIENDSHIP, LOVE AND TRUTH.

BY E. RONAYNE.

Whenever we undertake to examine the principles of Odd-fellowship, Freemasonry and kindred associations, we must always bear in mind that God's Word divides the whole human family into two classes, the saved and the lost, and that the religious character of those associations and the tenets which they inculcate must invariably be discussed in connection with this divine separation. Thus in examining the principle of "friendship" as set forth by Odd-fellowship, we have had it most clearly demonstrated to be "the friendship of the world," and consequently to be "enmity against God," so that "friendship" and "enmity" become, as it were, synonymous terms—"friendship of the world" on the one hand, "enmity with God" on the other. This is a most appalling reflection for an Odd-fellow, but more especially for an Odd-fellow who professes to be a Christian, and as I doubt not there may be some such men who will still read this paper I would most earnestly request careful attention while I try to examine and explain the second "link" of that wondrous "chain" which the devil, the great enemy of God, so cunningly entwines around the minds of his willing captives, that he may lure and lead them to hell and thus secure their eternal misery forever and forever and forever.

The second "link" in the "chain" of Odd-fellowship is "love." What is it and what does it signify? The Lord Jesus Christ has left to every believer in himself—to every "born again" one, a divine legacy of ineffable and eternal preciousness, namely, "peace, joy and love." John 14: 27. "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you." John 15: 11. "These things have I spoken unto you that my joy might remain in you and that your joy might be full." John 13: 1. "Jesus. . . . having loved his own which were in the world he loved them unto the end." And now mark the inexpressible value of these precious gifts. Phil. 4: 7: "The peace of God which passeth all understanding." 1 Pet. 1: 8: "Believing ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory." And Eph. 3: 19: "The love of Christ which passeth knowledge." Thus the child of God, the believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, has peace which passeth all understanding, joy unspeakable and love which passes knowledge. Peace which is beyond comprehension, joy which is beyond expression and love which is beyond knowledge. What a marvelous—what an exceedingly wondrous bundle of grace and glory is here bound up together, and it is all the believer's eternal and inalienable inheritance; and it is all his, simply and solely because Christ is his. 1 Cor. 3: 22, 23. "He that hath the Son hath life and he that hath not the Son of God hath not life," (1 Jno. 5: 12) no matter how much profession he may make or to what sect or system he may belong. And now what connection either remote or immediate can the principle of "love" as inculcated by Odd-fellowship have with this glorious legacy of the Son of God? None whatever. The name of Christ is never even mentioned nor dare it be mentioned in any lodge or encampment in connection with the hollow ceremonies in the solemn mockery of the Odd-fellow worship. There may possibly be a shadow of love existing among Odd-fellows, but if there be such a thing at all it must undoubtedly be "the love of the world." It cannot by any possible measure of allowance be "the love of Christ" which passeth knowledge, and neither can it be the "love of God" as manifested in the inestimable gift of his only begotten Son to be the Saviour of a guilty, lost and perishing world. John 3: 16. Odd-fellowship is a religion without Christ, and hence the love inculcated by Odd-fellowship cannot by any possible effort of thought or imagination be the love of Christ. God's love for a guilty, perishing world was measured by the gift of his only begotten Son. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." John 3: 16. "The love of Christ" for the church was measured by the gift of himself. "Christ also loved the church and gave himself for it." God loved a world of rebel sinners and gave his beloved Son; the Lord Jesus Christ loved the church and gave himself. He bought "the field"—the world—for the sake of the "treasure" in it. But what is the "love" of Odd-fellowship and what is its equivelant value and measure? It is simply and only the "love of the world" based upon a system of senseless passwords and measured by so many dollars and cents. "Love not the world, neither the things that are in the world. If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him." 1 John 2: 15. This is the "love" of Odd-fellowship, "the love of the world;" the love of the world that hated God's beloved Son and nailed him to a cross; the love of the world that hates and rejects him to-day just as much as then; the love of the "world which is lying in the wicked one." 1 John 5: 19. The "friendship" of Odd-fellowship is "enmity to God" and the "love" of Odd-fellowship is hatred to God. There is no evading this point and no amount of sophistry can change its unchangeable and inflexible truth. He who seeks the love of Odd-fellowship and who maintains fellowship with it is beyond all question or dispute at variance with God.

And now one word more to the Christian readers of the Cynosure on the subject of love as set forth by the Holy Ghost in the Gospels and first epistle by John. In no part of God's Word are believers in Christ ever called upon to behold their love to God, but on the contrary they are everywhere and invariably called upon to behold God's love toward them. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son." John 3: 16. "In this was manifested the love of God toward us because that God sent his only begotten Son into the world that we might live through him." 1 John 4: 9. "Herein is love." What? That we love God? No. "Herein is love, not that we loved God but that he loved us and sent his Son the propitiation for our sins." 1 John 4: 10. "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons of God." 1 John 3: 1. This is always and invariably the rule. We are called upon in every instance to gaze upon God's love, his infinite love to us and not upon our own poor, paltry, cold love to him; and hence when we realize how much God has loved us and what it has cost him to save us, it gives lasting peace to the conscience and rest and joy to the heart. Why did Adam hide from God among the trees of the garden? Because he did not understand that God loved him in spite of all his unbelief and disobedience. Had he realized to any degree of certainty that God loved him, he would never have gone a hiding from him, but because he did not know of God's love, he was "afraid" and hence he hid himself. And so the Holy Ghost in 1 John 4: 18 (a passage so much misquoted and so little understood) most blessedly sets before us the grand and satisfying truth. "There is no fear in love." In what love? Is it in our love to God? No, blessed be his name, but in his wondrous love to us; in the love of which the Holy Ghost has been speaking all the way down from verse 7 to verse 21. "Perfect love casteth out fear because fear hath torment." Where do you behold the "perfect love" here spoken of? Is it in your own heart for God? No, ten thousand praises be to his glorious name, but in the ever adorable Person of his own well-beloved and only begotten Son on Calvary's cross as he takes the sinner's place, assumes the sinner's liabilities, endures the sinner's judgment and "offering himself without spot to God" (Heb. 9: 14) "puts away sin by the sacrifice of himself." Heb. 9: 26.

Beloved reader, are you satisfied with him? Is your soul resting with unfailing security in his love thus manifested toward you and in his "finished" work for you? If it is not your profession is vain, your religion is just as Christless as Odd-fellowship and the love that you so loudly and so ignorantly talk about is your own love and hence nothing better than a "filthy rag" in the sight of him who loved you with a "perfect love" and who "commendeth his love toward you by sending his only begotten Son to die in your room and stead." Rom. 5: 8. How greatly deceived must that man or woman be who pretends to find in his or her own heart that "perfect love" which only dwells in God himself, and which was so wondrously displayed upon the cross when his own beloved Son was made sin in our behalf. 2 Cor. 5: 21. May you find eternal rest and peace and joy in him.

DISHONORING CHRIST.

BY REV. JAMES M. WHIPPLE.

Not long ago I was marking some of my thoughts in relation to the text, "Ye do dishonor me," and I took up a weekly paper and read the following:

"Baboo Keshub Chunder Sen has sent an epistle to the whole of the religious world. It is addressed: 'To all the great nations of the world, and to the chief religious sects in the East and in the West; to the followers of Moses, of Jesus, of Buddha, of Confucius, of Zoroaster, of Mahomet, of Nanac and the various branches of the Hindu church.' The journals of the various countries are requested to make it known. Its author professes to have received a new dispensation from heaven. It is a dispensation of universal brotherhood, founded on the Fatherhood of God. 'Thus saith the Lord, Sectarianism is an abomination unto me, and unbrotherliness I will not tolerate.' Chunder Sen has founded a church for the promulgation of this dispensation, which he calls the church universal, and with a 'magnificent audacity' prophecies the certain triumph of his new organization."

After reading the foregoing and having my main subject in mind, I marked the following. I do not quote all the above as the first effort to get up an organization embracing all religions; or, what is called a "universal religion," a sort of conglomerate of all beliefs in one brotherhood, the constitution of which fraternity giving no pre-eminence to the only Saviour of the lost.

It may be the last bold effort of the great adversary that has yet been promulgated, the legitimate tendency of which is to "dishonor" Jesus Christ, but it has its counterpart in that institution of boasted antiquity which bears the name of Freemasonry. This is claimed as a religion in which all believers in a Deity may unite, and where the absolute rejectors of the claims of Jesus Christ are held in the same fraternal bond!

It is noticeable that this new prophet, who professes to speak in the name of the Lord, gives the name of Jesus after that of Moses, and in such relation to others, as to destroy any superior claim to the honor which is really due to the only Saviour. And, if I understand it, Freemasonry has here a remarkable duplicate in this matter of dishonoring Christ.

Now it seems quite evident to me, that, whatever religion there may be in this new prophet's organization, or in the prototype I have noticed, it is not the Christian religion; and instead of giving Christian character to such institutions, by the union therewith of professed Christians and Christian ministers, the Christ of the Gospel is greatly dishonored by such an unhallowed union.

I am aware that the term "duplicate" which I have given, may need a little modification, but not in favor of the old archetype. In the new "church universal" the method of initiation is not mentioned; and it may not be under such horrid, blood-curdling oaths to secrecy as in the Masonic fraternity. In this regard, perhaps the old prototype acts the more dishonoring part toward him who said to the high priest when asked of his disciples and doctrine, "I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing. Why askest thou me? ask them who heard me, what I have said unto them; behold, they know what I said."

Somehow, the impression seems to abide with me that, as Saul of Tarsus was religiously engaged when persecuting and destroying Christians, and the papacy religiously engaged in the cruel execution of those they denominated heretics, so, in harmony with the religion of Freemasonry, the murderous act of abducting and destroying the martyr Morgan may be considered a religious act!

But such acts are so far removed from the Christian religion, that, when impressed upon my mind, I am sometimes led to exclaim, like the good old patriarch: "O my soul come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honor, be not thou united, for in their anger they slew a man."

Just think of a professed minister of Jesus Christ united in such a brotherhood, that, if he holds forth his Lord as the only Saviour, or declares, with earnestness that, "there is salvation in none other," he must be called to order by his Christless brethren of the same fraternity!! And it strikes me, that Jesus Christ is greatly dishonored, where silence concerning him is thus enjoined.

Distrusting Jesus Christ, in the matter of salvation, then, is a very direct method of dishonoring him. Trusting in the legal ceremonies of the old dispensation, in personal morality or self-righteousness, or, in any connection with secret, oath-bound organizations, is not only self-destructive, but dishonoring to the only Saviour which the infinite mercy of Heaven has provided for the lost.

NEWS FROM THE COMET.

Our readers will remember that when we parted from them on our celestial trip, we were wild with excitement over astonishing sights. One of the grand purposes of our sublime excursion was to find and survey the "Grand Lodge Above." Often had we helped read our holy brethren up to that celestial place, and the charm of our work has been that we have been no respecters of persons. No, we have found it just as easy to read, sing, pray and preach the profane (if not a cowan) the lecherous, the proud, the cruel tyrant, the drunkard and leaders of treason, up to the G. L. A., as it is to get the Revs. and D. Ds. there, provided they be alike faithful to all the usages of our dear craft. How oft have our mystic souls yearned to see the home of the diversified crew of deacons and drunkards, preachers and pirates, class-leaders and cut-throats, bishops and beelzebubs, so graciously ritualed up to glory. And when we have gazed on the blank face and glazed eyes of our dear brethren, "who have not lived out half their days," through some inscrutable providence, or uncontrolable propensity, we have so much desired to survey the mansion of these blessed ones, who depart in the faith of the G. A. O. T. U.

Well, dear reader, we are now just commencing to open our enraptured eyes on the celestial light of that great city. We have seen the twilight of mornings of the very brightest sunrising. These are a faint picture of what now flashes in our charmed faces from the celestial clime, yet billions of leagues away! It may seem a mystery to many how we are to endure the effulgent glory of that awfully grand place. We shall prepare as we approach. We are, even now, more luminous than the sun. More anon.

Here we drop our burning pen and wait a nearer approach to the home of Masons "in the skies." Grand Inspector General of the Southern Jurisdiction, sends a dispatch from the tail of the comet. His hat has blown off, his ears are cold, is sorry he had red men scalp our Union soldiers at Pea Ridge, invokes clemency of the sublime craft, and wants to join our conclave on the comet.

By special edict of our sublime body his is switched in, and joins our "thrice potents," "all puissants," etc. Grand Inspector General of N. D. greets him on the V points of fellowship. Then comes the "fulminating powders," the "strong powders," "charging" and "firing," till the face of the comet wore a blush of fiery redness as of one ashamed or very billious. "White powder" was very popular soon after. G. A. O. T. U. bless the brethren. So mote it be.

For the edification of common brethren we may remark that, "Fulminating powder," is beer, etc. "Strong powder"—whisky, etc. "White powder"—water. To "charge," is to fill the glass. To "fire," is to drink.

See Masonic glossary A. S. Rite Masonry, p. 582.

Next communication will reveal the G. L. A.

Significant Facts.—We have all heard such statements as these again and again, viz: "Freemasonry well lived out will save a man if anything can." "I used to be somewhat troubled about future things, but I am at peace now." "Masonry is as good a religion as I want." And these men evidence their faith in its teachings as will be seen when we consider first, that a very large percentage of our most moral but non-professing Christians are members of this, or some other moral order. Second, very few intelligent and established Freemasons ever become Christians. A paper with a circulation of more than 75,000 contained a standing request in the winter of 1876 and 1877, that if one of its readers should hear of a Freemason being converted he would report to the editor. Not one was reported. Third, numbers of our friends who never attend a Christian service, are most punctual in attendance at lodge. Fourth, pious Christians seldom if ever are known to join a secret order, and retain their piety. These are facts, potent and very significant.—Correspondence Christian Worker.

IS IT RIGHT?

Recently, in the little town of R——, a Methodist preacher was initiated into the first degree of Masonry. He was prompted to this by the solicitations of his friends, especially his brethren in the church of which he is pastor, who declared it would add much to his influence and increase his salary, and assured him that he could know nothing of the order unless he united with it.

Being a young man, he followed the example and advice of his elders, and soon found himself in the preparation room of the lodge. Here he declared to an officer of the lodge, upon his honor, he was not solicited by friends nor influenced by mercenary motives to seek the privileges of Masonry, but by a favorable opinion conceived of the institution and a desire for knowledge.

Now if Masonry is such a holy institution, why did it not reject this man for lying? For his friends (?) had urged him to the act, and persuaded by arguments of a mercenary nature; not referring to the stupidity he manifested in declaring a favorable opinion of an institution of which they had assured him he knew nothing. Now was it right for the minister to thus affirm? But you say the lodge required this declaration from him. Very well, then, is an institution that will require men thus to lie, at its very threshold, a good and worthy institution? Why not tell the truth?

But again, a Mason and member of this pastor's flock says to a man known to be opposed to Masonry, "Our preacher joined the Masons the other night." The man replied, "That was a wrong step;" to which the Mason rejoined as follows: "You do not know whether it is or not. No man knows anything about Masonry except he be a Mason. I affirm, sir, that you know nothing about Masonry. It has never been revealed, never can be; and besides, there is nothing objectionable in it. I was much impressed the other Sabbath at the way your preacher received members into the church; it was so near like the reception into Masonry. Believe me, sir, but little difference."

Let us look into the lodge and see the reception of the minister into the Masonic church. There he stands, stripped of all his clothing except his shirt, a pair of drawers upon him; left leg, arm and breast bare, a hoodwink over his eyes, cable-tow about his neck, slipper on his right foot, and the Worshipful Master pressing the point of the compass against his naked left breast. See him now kneeling at the altar and swearing under no less penalty than that of having his throat cut across, his tongue torn out by its roots, and his body buried in the sands of the sea at low water-mark, where the tide ebbs and flows twice in twenty-four hours– "So help me God!" —if he should reveal any of the sins of Masonry. Can you believe he is a minister of Christ? See how sanctimonious his church brethren appear while he is thus exposing his person and dishonoring God. See the corners of handkerchiefs protruding from the wide expanded months of the unconverted members of the lodge, who laugh to see the "parson" thus "taken in." "Believe me, sir, but little difference between joining church and the Masons!" Man, why will you lie so? Is it not Masonry? Can there be a more dishonoring act to Christ than for one openly professing his name to thus daringly lie, unsolicited, in defense of the idolatry of the lodge?

—Judge Nathaniel Shipman and 131 leading clergymen, lawyers, physicians, merchants, manufacturers, of Hartford, Conn., have signed the following: "Whereas, The circulation of the Police Gazette, Police News, and other pictorial papers of a like character, is calculated to corrupt the morals of the community and encourage vice and crime, we, the undersigned, respectfully request the dealers in periodicals to refrain from purchasing and selling the same, believing that by so doing they will aid in preventing crime and encouraging morality, religion and virtue."

—In a recent revival meeting at Dunkirk, O., under the direction of Bro. Welch, the gospel was faithfully preached, the unchristian character of Freemasonry plainly exposed, the church greatly revived, and seven sinners converted.

THE SERMON.

PREACHED BY E. D. BAILEY AT WASHBURN HALL, WORCESTER, MASS., MARCH 18TH, 1883.

Attention will be called to several passages of Scripture during the progress of this discourse, each of which will be announced in its proper place. The ancient idolatries are too seldom the subject of public instruction and, as a consequence, too little is known of them and too little thought of their bearing on the religions life of our times. It is proposed to say a few things about the idolatries of Jeroboam's time, and thus also impart a little general information upon the ancient systems of false worship.

The idolatries of Jeroboam's time commenced under the reign of Solomon, concerning which it is said: "They have forsaken me and have worshipped Ashtoreth, the goddess of the Zidonians, Chemosh the god of the Moabites, and Milcom the god of the children of Ammon." (1 Kings 11: 33.) In other passages the names of other gods occur. Commerce, social relations and inter-marriage were the prime causes of the introduction of these worships among the Jews.

These gods were the supposed deities of nations dwelling contignous to the Jews. Altars were erected on high hills, surrounded by clusters of trees, where the rites sacred to the worship of these gods, were observed. Those rites were often of a most shamefully licentous character. We are astonished to think that an intelligent people could whittle out with their jack-knives images and pay divine homage to them; we wonder that stone and brass and silver resemblances could have been objects of veneration by men of thought and wisdom. If, however, we remember that these images were only symbols and that originally the worshippers retained a thought of an invisible being worshipped only by symbol, we can see how readily even intelligent men might be deceived. In these modern days, when the light of a pure Christianity has brought the ancient idolatries into contempt, men are nevertheless beguiled into systems of symbolical worship in which their god appears under the figure of an eye, a star, or something equally powerless and unintelligent, and full grown men walk around altars dedicated to dead saints, engaging in ceremonies revolting to a pure mind.

One characteristic of these idolatries was that they invariably ministered to the baser passions of the devotees. The morality taught was spurious, and the characters assigned to the various deities were such as to fascinate a people who were reluctant to practice the pure virtues of the true religion.

Here is a brief description, given by one writer, of Ashtoreth, mentioned among the deities to which Solomon erected altars: "As Baal was the god of the sun, Ashtoreth was the goddess of the moon. Her chief temples were in Tyre and Zidon. According to ancient accounts her worship was of a licentious character. The oldest known image of her—that in Paphos—represented her simply under the form of a white conical stone. In Canaan and Phœnicia she was subsequently typified under the form of a cow, or sometimes she had only a cow's or bull's head; still later her emblem was a star and finally she was conceived of as 'the queen of heaven, sitting on a lion, her head surrounded with rays, and in the one hand a thunderbolt, in the other a scepter."

From this description it is plain that there was a human conception of some invisible being, and that the image, changing form at different times, was regarded only as a symbol. But it is also noticable that abundant provision was made for the gratification of licentious desires. Neither the mental conception, the image, nor the code of morals were such as would honor Jehovah. It was plainly a wicked device to deceive the people and destroy the true worship.

Chemosh, the second god mentioned, is supposed to be the same as Baal-peor, whose licentious worship early crept into the holy land and beguiled unwary souls. The worship of Jehovah was the worship of the true God, while the moral code, by which he was worshipped, was above reproach, but all these substitutes were dishonorable to God and degrading to the people.

On the accession of Jeroboam to the throne, as king of the ten tribes, he still further deceived the people. "Whereupon the king took counsel, and made two calves of gold, and said unto them, It is too much for you to go up to Jernsalem: behold thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of Egypt" (1 Kings 12:28). Several points here are worthy of note. He did not openly antogonize the worship of the people. To have done so would have defeated the object at which he aimed. A little lie would serve a better purpose. This religion is the same as that at Jernsalem—or in other words, "These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of Egypt." The people and the priests both assented. Shall we charge their folly to ignorance, duplicity or fear? Did they not know that those images were not their God?

Notice that the king offered a plausable excuse for setting up these calves—it was for convenience, as he told the people, but in fact the true reason was that he might wean the people from Jerusalem, and wed them forever to his own selfish political purposes. He lied then, both about the character of the worship and its object. Doubtless there were many dupes who believed every word he said, and could swear that there was nothing objectionable in the new system, but the fact remained that it was a fraud, devised for political purposes.

But notice again the awful insult to Jehovah of representing him as a calf! You could hardly insult a man more than to call him a calf, but these wretches dared to set up a dumb calf and call it Jehovah. It is easy to imagine that in preaching up this new worship they would seek for some precedent, and if so it is not improbable that they would refer to Aaron's calf as being a warrant for such proceedings, skillfully omitting of course, the severe denunciations pronounced upon that hideous monstrosity. The devil quoted Scripture to Christ, and false worshippers might even choose for a text the announcement that Aaron made them a calf. The very language used by Jeroboam suggests that this imposition was actually practiced upon the unlearned masses.

"And Jeroboam ordained a feast in the eighth month, on the fifteenth day of the month, like unto the feast that is in Judah, and he offered upon the altar" (2 Kings 12: 32). True to his purpose to deceive the people into the worship of his golden calves, he ordains some feasts just like those to which the people were accustomed in Jerusalem. He set them to keeping Christmas, Easter and St. John's days, and the people rub their hands in glee, saying to one another, "This is very convenient; we don't have to go to Jerusalem to keep the feasts; how good of our king!" while all the time the king chuckled among his lords at the success of his new enterprise, by which the true worship would soon be neglected and he could hold his subjects enslaved to his will through the new superstition which he had imposed upon them.

Every false worship has sought to win the favor of men by copying the true worship, thus deceiving the people. An altar looks holy even if the devil does inhabit it; songs, prayers, priests, and religious rites sound sacred, even though they are the strange fire of idolatry. It is Paul who tells us that the things which the Gentiles sacrificed, theo sacrifice to devils and not to God. These strange altars are the wiles by which he deceives the nations and retains his power. Revivals would sweep over the country and reach the multitudes were it not for the deceptions which are practiced upon them, by which their minds are beclouded and their national devotion alienated.

An additional fact is brought to light in the subsequent history of these worships: "And the children of Israel did secretly those things that were not right, against their God, and they built them high places in all their cities, from the high tower of the watchmen to the fenced city" (2 Kings 17: 9). Travelers say that there are large treeless regions where clusters of trees can only be seen on the tops of high hills, where they were planted by these false worshipers, in the midst of which was placed the false altar, where under the cover of secrecy they conducted their obscene, disgusting, degrading ceremonies. By being on high hills they could better guard against the invasion of the uninitiated, and by being in a grove they could practice ceremonies which were unfit for public exhibition. This is doubtless a part at least of the practice alluded to when it is said, "It is a shame to speak of those things which are done of them in secret." The general principle announced by our Saviour that men love darkness rather than light because their deeds are evil, holds true in all cases.

It may not be inappropriate to call up one more passage illustrative of one of the evils of idolatry. "They feared the Lord and served other gods." The question sometimes arises, what is the condition of persons who are ignorantly drawn into these false worships? Do they not serve God, since their intentions were good? The foregoing passage plainly answers these inquiries. It is possible for a man to have good intentions and yet do what has a tendency to destroy Christ's kingdom, and not to help it.

Place side by side two altars. Let them resemble each other in outward appearance. Let one be an altar dedicated to Jehovah, and the other an altar, ostensibly dedicated to Jehovah, but in fact to the Grand Architect of the Universe, or some other device of human ingenuity. Let the God of heaven sit upon the one and receive the oblations of the people, and let the "god of this world" sit upon the other and receive the homage of his worshipers. It will then be apparent that there is a vast difference which altar we worship at. All the money, time, talent and labor devoted to the one is, as Paul says, devoted to devils and not to God, while the other is directly in line of the interests of God's kingdom. What folly to contend that it makes no difference how and where one worships, only so his intentions are good! The difference is as wide as the difference between God and the devil, between Heaven and Hell.

The careful student of the Bible will not fail to have discovered that where ever the God of heaven is truly worshiped by his disciples, near his altar is one erected to some strange, mysterious divinity, whereby honest souls are beguiled into a service of wickedness, dishonorable to God and degrading to men.

It is a mistake to suppose that in modern times there is nothing corresponding to these ancient idolatries; that paganism and idolatry are wholly extinct and among the dead forces of the past. They still live and flaunt their shameful costumes in the face of our Christian civilization, claiming recognition for their antiquity and honor for their customs. They still live to assert their false doctrines over against the truth, to throw the veil of mystery and the shadow of uncertainty over the sublime doctrines of the Son of God. They still live to beguile the unwary to their false altars and to maintain political ascendency by their false pretences. This fact, seldom asserted except with bated breath, is the living fact to which we must be speedily aroused or the snare which Jeroboam spread will have entrapped our people and the evils which followed his apostacy will run rampant in our midst.

One more fact needs to be recorded before we stop. In the thirteenth chapter of First Kings an account is given of a prophet of the Lord who came forth from Judah to cry out against the abominations of Jeroboam. The Lord had taken note of the false altar and sent forth the preacher to protest. It is recorded that the king stretched out his hand against the prophet, thus fully justifying the reputation of these idolaters that they will forcibly resist even the God of heaven. In the allegory of the son of the bond woman and the son of the free we are plainly taught that the true worship of God has always been subject to persecution by the false. The darkest pages of history are the record of the bloody attempts of the sinful to suppress the testimony of the righteous. "They that will live godly shall suffer persecution." But it should not be forgotten that the hand of the king stretched forth against the prophet, was paralyzed. God rules and with him there is power to accomplish his own righteous purposes.

New England.

THE NEW ENGLAND BOARD of the National Christian Association has its headquarters at No. 8 Portland St., Worcester, Mass. A full supply of books and tracts constantly on hand. Orders promptly filled. Correspondence solicited.

E. D. Bailey N. E. Sec'y.

The Grand Lodge of Connecticut has been trying for a few years to raise a fund of $100,000 for a Masonic hospital. They have raised about $5,000 of the amount already. The contributions during the past year aggregated $1,302.85. The prospect is gloomy.

In Arkansas a Mason applied for a dimit on the ground that the teachings of Masonry violated his conscience. The Grand Master administers the following consolation: "I told them to give it to him, that Masonry must not interfere with a man's religious opinions, and that if he cannot obey the teachings and practice the virtues of Masonry without endangering his chances for heaven—for God's sake leave the lodge at once and never enter our holy temple again. But I cannot see why Masons should quarrel about our 'peculiar belief'—provided we all believe in God." This tender and sympathetic language must have been very comforting to a conscientious Christian, especially as it only profanes the name of God once! Is a belief in Christ a 'peculiar belief' in the above classification? Apparently so.

Thus far only one letter expressing an opinion adverse to the Vermont Convention has been received. One gentleman expresses the opinion that the time has not come to organize the State, but he promises to help if friends think best to go forward.

J. M. Doe, of Vermont, writes concerning the Convention: "I am in favor of having a Convention. I will attend it if possible, and will be happy to help bear the expenses. As to the place to appoint it, perhaps Montpelier would be a good place, but you will probably hear from others with regard to that matter. I am glad something is going to be done in this State in the way of reform, and will render all the assistance I am able."

Gen. Phelps offers some good suggestions about the Vermont Convention, suggesting Montpelier as the best place, "There are some twelve or fifteen principal centers in the State," he says, "where lectures ought to be given, but in not one of them do I know of any persons who would be ready to open the door for them. Yet at no time has the occasion for such lectures been more opportune than now."

ATTENTION, VERMONTERS.

We have reached the time for decisive action. Many have been wishing for a State convention, and now the time has come to move forward. Mr. O. C. Bailey has gone to Vermont to locate the place for a convention, after consulting with friends, to fix the time and to awaken an interest in the movement. We hope to have the convention within six weeks, and to hold it near the central part of the State. There should be no holding back, but a spontaneous movement for a successful convention. Circulars have already been sent to interested parties, inviting their co-operation. There is no reason why Vermont may not speedily step to the front in this movement. Let every friend of the cause determine upon a hearty and zealous co-operation.

A THEISTIC CHURCH.

The new Theistic or Eclectic church which the Rev. Mr. Schemerhorn and his compeers launched in Horticultural Hall, New York, Sunday, March 18th, has already found a stormy sea. Their religion may by very gentle and catholic, and pure and ennobling, but the apostles of that religion seem very much like other men. It does not speak well for the cause that in a wrangle over the program for the first meeting the leader should call a man a "bigot," and apply other severe epithets to him, simply because he wrote in an abrupt manner that he could not attend such a meeting, and did not want his name used for such a purpose. We might offer as a friendly suggestion, that this new church form an offensive and defensive alliance with the Masonic lodges. The religion of Masonry, so say their best authorities is pure theism, so that the two would agree in this respect. To be sure Masonry excludes women; but as women and children take more kindly to the churches, such an alliance might provide for families, gathering the men into the lodge with women in the church, and the children in the Sabbath-school. But the main advantage would be that these two organizations would find the common ground which made Pilate and Herod friends, viz.: opposition to Christ and his church. When men can speak of Moses and the Egyptian Magi as equals, religiously considered, and write "There never was a false god, nor was there ever a really false religion, unless you call a child a false man," their spiritual blindness is too apparent to need comment. If there is any difference between the true and the false in anything, the same difference is found in religion; and any religion that leaves men's souls without the gift of eternal life, which comes to men through Jesus Christ, is a false religion.

A STATE MEETING FOR VERMONT.

Worcester, Mass., Apr. 2, 1883.

No correspondence has been more satisfactory this year than that which comes to us from Vermont friends concerning a State convention. There seems to be a very general and hearty desire for a State meeting, and a good disposition to attend and provide for the expenses.

Nearly all our correspondents express a preference for Montpelier as the place of convening. O. C. Bailey is now visiting some of the places suggested to see what opportunities are before us so that we may have definite data on which to base a judgment. He will probably reach St. Johnsbury this week, after visiting Montpelier and other towns, and will there consult with friends whose judgment will be reliable.

It would not be surprising if work opened more favorably in Vermont than in many other States. That was once the banner State in the reform, and there is evidently a latent sentiment of opposition to the secret orders now throughout the State. If this sentiment can be reached and brought forward the lodge will soon feel it.

Mr. Spaulding returned to Worcester last week to replenish his supply of books and papers, returning again this week to his field in the vicinity of Springfield. Boston and vicinity will be my own rendezvous during the week. E. D. Bailey.

PERSONAL MENTION.

Henry Harrison Esq., of New York, says the Christian Instructor, has in his zeal for purity of worship ordered the publication of a series of tracts treating on different phases of the subject. Three of these are already issued and are being sent out gratuitously. Any one can secure them in any desired quantity for use and distribution by applying to Mr. Harrison, 307 W. 33d St., N. Y.

Pres. E. E. White, who lately resigned his position at the head of Perdue University, Lafayette, Ind., because of the action of the State legislature upholding the college secret orders in that institution, put the whole question at issue in a clear light in his letter of resignation in which he says: "For the first time in the history of American colleges, it is proposed by legislative enactment to give the students of a college immunity to organize societies of any kind within the institution, and to give the societies thus organized the protection of law, whatever their character or influence, and however subversive they may be of the government or the purposes of the institution, provided only they bear a Greek-letter title, or are secret. This is setting up in Purdue University an imperium in imperio, with the full authority of law,—a virtual surrender of the authority of the University, to self-constituted students' societies. It is an ominous subversion and overthrow of the authority essential to the proper control, not only of Purdue University, but of every college,—an authority which has been exercised in some form by nine-tenths of the colleges of the United States, and which exists and is recognized in all."

Elder S. Knapp.—The Joliet, Ill. News of the 30th ult. has a long description of the happy celebration of the 80th birthday of Solomon Knapp of that city, well known for many years among the Baptist churches of northern Illinois. A house full of old people gathered on invitation, and enjoyed a kind of old neighbor's love-feast in recounting the experiences of early days. A bountiful and well-spread dinner, choice music, a poem and a number of brief addresses followed. Hon. Henry Snapp, a well known name in the Republican party of Illinois, reviewed the active life of the Elder since 1840. He said that Elder Knapp's sympathies and labors had always been on the side of humanity. He was not slow in entering his protest against human slavery; then his voice was raised alike against the awful evil of intemperance, and at all times was ready to preach the gospel to the poor, and minister to the distressed in mind or body. In short, his life, from beginning to this his 80th birthday, had been one of unequalled usefulness, tempered with the true spirit of Christianity. Mr. Snapp paid a high tribute to the worth of Mrs. Knapp who had served her part as every true woman should. He should have added also that Elder Knapp was not only engaged actively in these reforms when they were popular, but enlisted when to do so was at the cost often of reputation and property. Nor does he forget to maintain the same principles in his old age. He is well known for his testimony against the great evil of the secret orders.

As the speeches closed Judge Olin stepped forward and presented the Elder with a fine gold-headed cane as a token of esteem from his neighbors. The whole occasion was a fine testimonial to the worth and noble character of a faithful servant of Christ.

THE MICHIGAN STATE CONVENTION.

Allegan, March 20, 1883.

The next meeting of the Michigan State Association has been called to meet in Grand Rapids, on the 17th, 18th, and 19th of April next. Luce's Hall has been engaged foi the occasion, and every effort will be made by the friends in the city to make the meeting a success, and also to furnish entertainment for those who may come. We expect Bro. Starry, of Iowa, to be present to give the inside view of lodge work by the light of three tallow candles, while Bro. Stoddard and others will turn the electric lights of God's truth upon these systems of error, thus bringing to light the hidden things of darkness.

But there is one thing we must remember, and that is this: These brethren may do their part right grandly, but if we fail to do ours, in the way of attendance and support, the meeting will not be a success. Let us then rally from all parts of the State to this annual gathering. Grand Rapids is a railroad center, easy of access from every quarter, and we can, if we will, make this a meeting of the most intense interest. We believe there are five hun dred men and women in Michigan whom God will hold responsible for any failure in this meeting if they are not present. Are you one of them?

As had been requested, let all the subscribers to Alliance stock come if possible, that we may counsel together. Bro. Foote made our heart throb with hope with his subscription for thirty-five shares of stock, why not others do likewise, and prove their faith by their works.

Remember the date, the 17th, 18th and 19th of April, and the place, Luce's Hall, Grand Rapids.

LETTERS FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

SELF-CONDEMNED.

Bunker Hill, Ind.

The Progressive Dunkards have been carrying on a protracted effort for some three weeks in what is known as the Biggs school-house, two miles from Bunker Hill. The interest was marked and results very satisfactory. Large crowds attended and the place was "too strait" for the accommodation of all who desired to participate in the exercises. Near by is a spacious meeting house capable of accommodating the multitudes, which is owned by another society of Dunkards. Application was made for the use of this large room, but for some reason the request was not granted.

Yesterday as I was posting bills and giving notice of a lecture. I chanced to fall in with a Freemason. After exchanging a few words I accepted his kind invitation to a seat in his carriage. Our theme was Freemasonry, and the man seeming to fail in his attempted defense of the order turned to the church and to the conduct of professed Christians, and gave the above as an instance in proof of the unchristian and unkind treatment shown by church members toward each other, and then asserted that Masons were never guilty of such mean, uncharitable acts. The man said, "I am no church member, but I like to see fair play."

I think he was sincere, but he evidently had not reflected seriously on the subject. It had never occurred to him that the isolated instance which he so strongly denounced was the constitutional and constant law and practise of the lodge, which he was attempting to justify as right in itself, and to magnify by comparison with an extreme and very unusual case in the church. His ideal of perfection closes its doors and guards all approach to the altars of its worship with a drawn sword, against every other body of worshipers, and a cry of exclusiveness and bigotry comes with a very ill grace from a man whose conduct in the lodge is a constant endorsement of what he condemns and denounces in the church. The church teaches piety and lifts men to a higher plain of morality and makes them better in every respect. The lodge professes to be engaged in the same beneficent work, and to strive for the attainment of the same results. If its profession is not hypocrisy and its morality a sham, why should it adopt as a standing, unalterable decree what it denounces as unchristian and unkind in others? The lodge has never to my knowledge condemned an instance of exclusiveness where the use of a church has been denied for a lecture by one opposed to secret societies; and it would seem that it is not the principle they would condemn, but would take advantage of any irregularity on the part of a church or church member to glorify their beloved order.

BRETHREN LOYAL AND TRUE.

Dublin, Ind., Apr. 2.—Leaving Bunker Hill at 5 A.M Saturday. I reached Indianapolis at 8, and went to the business office of our old friend Brice, upon whom the years and cares of councilman in the city government have left traces. He gave me a cordial welcome. At the depot I was agreeably surprised to meet Asher Kellum, who had driven in from Friendsville, and from him I learned of the decease of Preston Allen, who was gathethered as a shock of corn fully ripe in his season. I hope to visit and speak at Friendsville before leaving the State.

I reached Dublin at 1 P. M., and was soon with friends and at the house of Dr. Champ who never allows an opportunity to do good to pass unimproved. Arrangements had been made for me to preach in the morning and lecture in the afternoon in the U. B. church. These appointments I filled and am to speak again this afternoon at the same place. The meeting last evening was well attended, and the audience gave patient attention for an hour and three quarters to what I had to say about the religion of Freemasonry. The pastor, Bro. Jones, is an active young man, greatly beloved by his people, thoroughly respected in the community and warmly enlisted in reform work. Here also I have met Bros. Fast, Butler, Wilson and others, who are full in the faith.

This morning brings to me a number of letters from head-quarters, and after calling on some of the friends and looking after business, I shall reply to these missives of inquiry and kindly greetings from friends widely scattered but highly esteemed.

UNPLEASANT EXPERIENCES.

Cambridge, Ind., Apr. 3.—At Dublin Bro. Jones showed me every kindness and was, I trust, helped in his work of bringing souls to Christ and in maintaining the testimony of "the fathers" against the dark abominations of secrecy. Bro. G. W. Fast, financial agent for Hartsville College, was present and aided most heartily at each meeting. My home was with the model family of Bro. Geo. W. Champ, where each member consults the wishes of the others and all seem to find their highest earthly enjoyment in making each other and those whom they entertain happy. They have been much tried by sickness of late, but are coming forth as gold refined in the fire.

There are two things in the experience of an Antimasonic lecturer that are trying to his faith, and fidelity, in both of which I had experience in Dublin. (1.) To leave the pleasant associations and helpful councils of a Christian house-hold and strike out as a wanderer, requires nerve; and (2) to talk with a woman whose husband is a Mason about the great sin and wicked hypocrisy and deep deception of Freemasonry. It is extremely difficult at such times to avoid seeming personalities. I avoid such cases where possible to do so and "keep a conscience void of offense," and invariably stop when the "tears come," the last and most potent argument of an intelligent, devoted wife when pleading for the honor of husband and home.

From here I go to Knightstown and hope ere the sunset of this beautiful day to grasp the friendly hand of "Quaker Boy."

A WORD FOR THE FRIENDS.

Knightstown, Ind., April 3d.—I am detained here several hours in making connections by stage to Carthage. In appearance this is really an attractive place, of some 2,000 inhabitants, and quite a thrifty center of a productive country. The place contains about the usual quota of hotels, stores, mills, etc., and has five churches: M. E., Presbyterian, Baptist, Friends and Catholic. The Freemasons and Odd-fellows each have a lodge, and my informant, who was an O. F., reports them in a prosperous condition. So far as I could ascertain there are no persons holding a joint membership in any two or more of the churches, but in reply to my inquiry if any of the church members belonged to the lodges, I was told that they did, especially the leaders in Friends meeting. When I asked, "Do they belong to both Masons and Odd-fellows?" my informant replied, "I think so." A lady present, who I took to be his wife, said, "You are not a Mason, and can't tell certainly."

I inquired if there had been any public discussion of the question in the place, to which both replied in the negative. The state of religion was represented as low in the churches, although the Friends, assisted by a lady from abroad, are just now making an effort to "revive." I learned that my informant was connected with the M. E. church, and that his pastor, Rev. J. C. Murray, is not an Odd-fellow, and probably not a Mason. Having obtained considerable information, and engaged both the man and the woman in an "easy chat," I asked if they had ever heard of any organized opposition to secret societies. Both were indefinite in their replies, and felt very sure that any effort of the kind must fail. I gave them my card, and explained the nature of the N. C. A. and its work, which brought us face to face as opponents. They had their opinions of any man who would go back on his obligations, and of strangers meddling with other people's business that did not concern them, and of "tramps" generally, and as this opinion was not flattering to my personal vanity, I withdrew, leaving them to the quiet enjoyment of their own peculiar views. If this Odd-fellow stated facts about Friends in this place, it is a case demanding attention from the authorities. The Richmond yearly meeting is Quakerism par excellence, and if members are allowed to retain a double membership in lodge and church in violation, if not in contempt of "Discipline," "Ichabod" is written upon her walls. It is a matter that deeply concerns the whole body of Friends and vitally effects their entire polity.

If members are allowed to live in violation of their covenant, and belong to two religious bodies that are directly antagonistic, they will soon lose not only the confidence and respect of others, but their own self respect. Will not loyal Friends in Knightstown, Carthage and the yearly meeting to which this society belongs, look to this matter, and if this Odd-fellow and M. E. brother has slandered his neighbors to glorify the lodge, as some are wont to, "rebuke him as a brother; and if he repent forgive him," but if not, publish him as a scoundrel. Let us have the facts whoever suffers.

EN ROUTE TO JERICHO.

Editor Cynosure:—Bro. Thompson has told your readers of our trip to Spring Grove school-house. We waded in mud and water eight miles that night ere we reached home. This trip and its consequences was not ignored by the Entered Apprentice correspondent of one of the Seneca papers, whose sense is on a par with his syntax. As soon as I was able I was out again, and was informed of an exciting trial then in progress in Slosson's Hall. A man named Miller, a Mason, was charged with stealing a certain quantity of coal from J. R. Lensley, a coal dealer, who is not a Mason. At the suggestion of a friend I went up to hear the pleading of the attorneys on both sides.

Mr. McCaul, the attorney for Mr. Lensley, reviewed the evidence, and on that alone based his appeal for justice; while he skillfully analyzed and ably presented it to that court. The defendant's counsel followed by a stirring appeal to the passions of the jury, touching the effects of conviction on the defendant's family. But he touched with gentle hands that evidence.

Mayor Corwin, who presided at that trial, is a Master Mason. Mr. J. Rison, one of that jury, is a Master Mason. Mr. Jas. Belyea is a Master Mason—I helped to "make him"—I believe God for Jesus' sake has forgiven me; I never will be guilty of a like transgression.

As the case went to the jury I left the room, and entered one of the finest business houses in this city, where, as clerk, is employed Mr. Christ, an intelligent gentleman but a Mason. He had not been near the trial. but was on duty in the store, and as I approached the stove where some others were seated, he came near. One of the parties asked me how the trial was going. I replied that the case had just gone to the jury, and that they had not brought in their verdict when I left; but that it was merely a question of time what that would be. "Meanwhile," I continued, "if you must anticipate that verdict, ask Mr. Christ."

He replied at once by saying, "That will be water in your mill, won't it?"

"You depend upon that," I said, "and I'll make the most of it."

The next morning a Mason lost his jewel in his haste to inform me that "Miller is not a Mason." That he is a Mason I know from what I have seen of him and from the testimony of Masons in good standing in the lodge here If Masons here or elsewhere choose to let me know anything to my advantage, I'm not under obligation, to inform the public who they are, or the nature of the information, if by so doing it would involve them. If some affiliated Mason should say for example, "Remember the ides of March," I should then "govern myself accordingly." Miller is not a member of Sabetha lodge, but has his membership elsewhere.

The verdict was "Not guilty." Verily, though Mr. Christ does not profess to be a prophet, he and your humble friend had some advantage over "profanes" in this instance. Two oaths, struggling for supremacy in a juror's mind, cannot have a protracted contest when one of them is first in the citadel and "holds in its hands an instrument of death."

I reviewed the above in about so many words while lecturing at Campbell's school-house, upon which one

CORRESPONDENCE.

GOOD WORK AT A CORNER STONE LAYING.

March 30, 1883.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—I have purposely delayed this communication about the laying of the corner stone of the new La Fayette court-house, Oct. 26, 1882, by the Masonic fraternity. An Odd-fellow told me his lodge tried to divide the honors of the occasion with the Masons, but was ordered to take a "back seat." Still they did march with them like little boys following the big ones. Much idolatrous pomp was displayed, and several Masonic prayers, all ignoring the name and offices of Christ were palmed off to the people as genuine worship of that God who gave his only begotten Son to be our Saviour. At the time I was within a few feet of the corner stone with Anti-masonic tracts and papers to distribute, and I called out audibly, "No Christ in Masonic prayer" twice, once after each prayer, and distributed what tracts I could. One of the officers finally ordered the Grand Chaplain to pronounce the benediction, but instead of doing so according to Masonic ritual which rejected Christ, now that public attention was called to that fact, he singles out an old Methodist preacher, Aaron Wood, who I suppose was a Mason, and says, "Brother Aaron Wood, pronounce the benediction:" which he did in the name of Christ. Thus a Christian benediction was palmed off as being a Masonic one, to drown the attention before the people who had just been notified of their blasphemous idolatries and false worship as taught by Freemasonry.

Here we see the evil a preacher is capable of doing in such a relation, and possibly almost unaware of the fact that he covers up the Masonic devil of anti-Christ so abundant in lodgery and so conspicuous to all wise and conscientious observers. I tell you one such preacher can do, and does more harm in blocking the wheels of reform, and is the direct means of more souls going to ruin, for want of light and knowledge which would cause them to turn from this wickedness, than ten ordinary bad men could possibly do. It sickens the heart of any truly awakened soul to look on such a spectacle. I fear we are too timid and not enough in earnest against so great a foe to the well being of man.

The greatest satisfaction of the occasion to me was, I was able to deposit in the little copper box that was sealed up in the corner-stone, a copy of the Christian Cynosure of the date Sept. 7, 1882, containing the picture of the statue of Capt. William Morgan on his monument. The means by which I was enabled to do this seems strictly providential to me, as it was not then, nor is it yet known to any of the Masons that this document is in the curious little copper box resting in the corner stone. I wrote my name first on the inside of the paper with a vermilion or copying lead pencil as a lasting testimony against the idolatry that usurped all the ceremonial honors of the occasion. May the Lord be honored in what I did for his truth and bring good out of it.

Yours for the reign of Christ on earth,

Lorenzo D. Brown.

WHAT CAN BE DONE IN A NEIGHBORHOOD.

[From a letter to Rev. C. C. Foote.]

Albion, Iowa, March 15th, 1883.

I have distributed hundreds of such tracts, will do some good with these. I have had a dozen of Weed's pamphlets. That person called Mrs. Monroe, that claimed Morgan's body, was a small, smooth shaved man, dressed in woman's clothes—a Masonic trick to deceive people as to Morgan's body. I have seen the time when a Masonic lodge dare not assemble in York State and other States for twelve years. I have seen the time when forty newspapers grew out of the Morgan excitement. No paper dare tolerate one word of Masonry. Where a father who was a Mason his sons would refuse to eat at the table with him, till he renounced. I knew a convention in Leroy, Genesee county, where 103 Masons endorsed the truth of Morgan's book, and exposed Masonry to the last and 33d degree. In 1835, I would no more have believed that Masonry would ever revive, than that the moon would fall to the earth. History in New York records it a bygone wicked thing. The Masons have destroyed most of those histories, but not all.

When I came here a few years ago, every officer in the corporation was a Mason; every officer in the township war a Mason; of five ministers in this place four were Freemasons, they prayed in the pulpit and disowned the Saviour in the lodge; everything was in their hands. I sent for a few Cynosures, and circulated them among the people. In two years we voted the Masons all out of office in the corporation and township, hence the great excitement in Albion." I saw in papers from Cincinnati of "the great excitement in Albion." The Voice of Masonry in Chicago, said; "Albion is known throughout the State and probably the nation." Iowa is noted for its opposition to Masonry. The great Mogul of Masonry, Rob Morris, came through this State one year ago last winter, lecturing the lodge. He came to this place; told the lodge "to hold the offices and hold the church." They can't hold the offices. After what I have seen and what I now see, that wicked institution controling everything, what can I think? I have lost much confidence in the virtue of men. But I rejoice in the success so far in the reform. Am thankful that I have lived to know the Batavia monument stands a lasting rebuke to Masonry. I I paid a little for the publishing house in Chicago. I paid some for the monument. I must pay a little for the house at Washington, which is of great importance. It is boarding the lion in his den. It is the only way people can know the iniquity practiced at our capital. I neither hear nor pay a Mason preacher. Whatever I can spare I pay in the reform cause.

I am faithfully yours, A. C. Moffatt.

FORGED INSCRIPTIONS.

It is said by Thompson in "The Land and the Book" that Mohammedan rulers often insert slabs with pompous inscriptions over entrances to buildings which they did not erect. There are many such vaunting records on castles, temples and churches, older than the era of Mohammed; and the architects of the country are so skilled in these in these insertions that the forgery cannot be easily detected.

Did Dr. Rob Morris take the hint from the Mohammedans in putting the marks of the lodge upon the stones and relics of the Holy Land? Probably the Doctor did not connive with the Mohammedan skilled architects, as the Knights Templars did with the Saracens, to aid him in his pious (?) work. They could both have a common object in so doing, since both are deadly opposed to the Christian cowans or dogs. It might be interesting if the Doctor would give us his reasons for defacing the ruins of Palestine in this way. Did he think that he could palm off such forgeries upon scholars as well as upon the ignorant dupes of the lodge? Alas, Doctor!

A FACT WORTH NOTING.

About fifteen years ago we were appointed by the Abington Baptist Association to write an essay, to be read at a subsequent ministers' conference in Blakely, Lackawanna Co., Pa., on the subject of "Secret Societies." This essay greatly incensed the crafts of "legion name," especially the old parent Masonry. The Odd-fellows, Good Templars and the Masons, each had an advocate there in the persons of Baptist ministers, each "pleading for Baal." Rev. (?) B. T. Bowen, a Mason, plead for Masonry. Recently, in the Scranton Republican, is found a notice of Bowen's most disgraceful conduct. Brought under censure, because of his fiendish conduct toward his wife, he turns upon a Baptist informer of his cruelty and beats him most fiercely, threatens to tear his heart from his body (Masonic) "if he did not do it in twenty five years."

He was taken into custody; promised solemnly and with seeming penitence to keep the peace; was then released (perhaps by Masonic interposition); then the very next morning went like a mad tiger once more for his victim. This time he is put under bonds of $200 to keep the peace. If he should, hereafter, execute his fiendish threat, and pull out the heart of his victim, the bond money might be raised by the craft, and his Masonic honor preserved from the halter by any needed sum. Let all true Masons note the case "and govern themselves accordingly." We believe Masonry has kept him in the Baptist pulpit for years. "Handmaid of religion," save thy trusting minions! "So mote it be."

Nathan Callendar.

OUR CIRCLE.

"G. W. H.," our well-informed Michigan friend, begins the conversation with a criticism upon a statement made by an old Baptist minister, reported March 22, and leaves it somewhat tattered:

"We have well ascertained and reliable information of the abduction of Morgan, the route taken by the abductors, all the places at which the carriage stopped, his confinement in Fort Niagara, and even of his final taking off. Such a story as Homer Hull tells in a late Cynosure, which he heard from an old Baptist minister, is simply absurd, and can only mislead those who are not properly informed. Enough to say, there is not, and never was, such a place as Williamsburg, seven miles from Fort Niagara, nor anywhere else in New York, except on Long Island. Nor was there any other village seven miles from Niagara, or on the Ridge Road from Rochester, the road taken by the carriage with Morgan, in which there was a college, the most of whose students belonged to a Masonic lodge. The assumption that such was the case, and that the minister aforesaid was the lodge's doorkeeper, kept the keys and fought off the men who wished to do the work of murder in his lodge, is transparent bosh, and should be buried with the story of Vallance. Such stories either come from heads that have been confused by conflicting reports, or they are concocted with a design to confuse others."

Bro. A. C. Wiggins, of Footville, Wis., must be a veteran from the following:

"When I was eighteen years of age I was at the funeral of an uncle who was a magistrate, and also a Royal Arch Mason. His coffin was placed in the broad aisle, and upon it a sword, square and compass, and the Bible. A Presbyterian minister, a Royal Arch Mason, officiated, and a small band of the order had charge. This was in Another veteran in the temberance ranks, Alex. Cole, Manamuskin Manor, N. J., has a suggestion which is not without merit as a restriction upon a great evil. But we must not forget that intemperance is a sin and with it there can be no compromise:

"Fifty-three years ago I signed a temperance pledge, and ever since then I have done what little I could to promote the cause. I have now come to the conclusion that it will be some time before we can get a national prohibitory law, until then the license laws should be made as onerous as possible. Every wholesale dealer should be made to keep a record of each and every sale of kind, amount, price, and name and place of residence of the purchaser, a true sworn copy filed in the county clerks office at the end of every three months, and published in the two leading papers in the county, at the expense of the dealer. Each retail dealer should be made to keep a dram book, wherein shall be recorded the name, age and residence of every person to whom drinks are sold or given, a copy in the same manner as in the case of wholesale dealers, to be filed and published. By doing this we could not only know who the rum suckers were; but also have data to determine exactly the amount of liquors sold and drank in each county."

Our friend "Senex" of this city, has been taking notes of the celebrations of the man-invented anniversary of Christ's resurrection, and has found one case upon which he remarks:

"Not long ago one of our city Unitarian preachers gave up the pulpit for the stage and last "Easter" Sunday gave an opportunity for another to show his independence of Scripture authority by denying that Jesus the Christ arose from the dead and spake with his disciples before he ascended into heaven. Christianity accepts the Scripture account of the resurrection as assuredly as of the crucifiction of Christ, for if Christ be not raised believers are yet in their sins (1 Cor. 15:), but this preacher in the Church of Messiah (what a misnomer if Christ be not risen?) teaches that he does not believe he has risen and that the resurrection means only the improvement of mankind! To use his own words: "Resurrection Sunday means for us the celebration of the rising up of humanity—human improvement." Evidently Mr. Utter is in harmony with the scepticism which prompted Mr. Miln to abandon the pulpit, and we are unable to see what claim any man has to be regarded as a Christian at all who denies the resurrection of the Lord Jesus Christ according to the Scriptures. We know not i fMr. Utter is or not Freemason, but certainly his utterances are quite in keeping with Masonic teaching on this subject. Hear Mackey, 'The Masonic scholar who is familiar with the constitution of those mysteries of the pagan priests and philosophers is well aware that they inculcate by symbolic and allegoric instruction the great lessons of the Resurrection of the body and the immortality of the Soul.' Now hear Mr. Utter: 'For one, I am glad that the name of Easter survived, for in the word forever will remain a history, a sweet old story of our Northern ancestors, how with joy and feasting they celebrated the resurrection before they heard of Christ.' Yes he regards the heathenish observances of the resurrection (of Hiram Abiff perhaps?) a sweet old story, but of the resurrection of Christ what does he say? He says 'I cannot feel sure that it took place.....Paul preached the resurrection of Jesus and wrote that he had seen him. But Paul did not mean a bodily resurrection.' And again 'The resurrection of the body we do not believe in, and for the strange reason, because we believe in life everlasting,' and it seems a physical impossibility."

CLIQUES.

Webster tells us that everybody knows, or ought to know, that a clique is "a narrow circle of persons; a party; used commonly in a bad sense." It is natural that a man, a social being, should seek the society of his fellows. It is the will of God that men should dwell in families and communities. The Lord Jesus willed that there should be a church, a communion of saints. Believers are not to stand alone, but to unite with others, in order, as Paul wisely, truly, and gracefully says to the Romans, "that I may impart unto you some spiritual gift, that is, that I may be comforted together with you by the mutual faith both of you and me." The Lord has promised his special presence in the midst of two or three gathered in his name. There is strength in union. If individuals are to accomplish anything, they must unite with others. The strong are weak without a following. The weakness of many individuals becomes strong by consolidation and co-operation. In this way "a narrow circle of persons" may be bound together by the purest motives, and may be instrumental in moving the whole church, and doing much good. But such a little band is not a clique.

A clique, in church or State, is "a narrow circle of persons" of narrow, selfish views and ends. They meet, and plan, and plot, not for the general good, but to promote the ends of their little party, and of each member thereof. They are constantly putting their heads together. They cultivate secret methods. They stand aloof from others. They take no part in general movements. To them the clique is of more importance than the party, the State, or the church. If there is a clique it needs to be watched. It is a hot-bed to raise weeds. It is a storm-center. It is a stagnant pond, apparently very still, but actively engaged in sending forth malarious emanations. No wonder good men do not like cliques.—Lutheran.

—The affection and respect with which England's great Premier is regarded among his Midlothian constituents is shown by the following conversation which took place during the campaign of 1880 between a Dalkeith minister and workingman. Said the latter: "Do you see that hand?" "Yes; it seems to be a hardworking hand." "Aye, but that's no what I mean. Do you see that hand?" "Yes." "That hand shook Mr. Gledstane's hand the day!" "Yes?" "Aye, that hand shook Mr. Gledstane's hand the day; and what's mair, that hand shook Mrs. Gledstane's hand the day; aye, and what's mair, that hand shook Miss Gledstane's hand the day!" Then, looking at the brawny member with undisguised admiration: "Noo, d'ye think I should wash it?"

American Politics.

NOMINATIONS FOR 1884.

For President,
JONATHAN BLANCHARD
OF ILLINOIS.

For Vice President,
JOHN A. CONANT,
OF CONNECTICUT.

PLATFORM.

We hold: 1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That God requires and man needs a Sabbath.

3. That the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is the true policy on the temperance question.

4. That the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

5. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by articles 13th, 14th and 15th of our amended Constitution should be preserved inviolate.

6. That arbitration of differences with nations is the most direct and sure method of securing and perpetuating a permanent peace.

7. That to cultivate the intellect without improving the morals of men, is to make mere adepts and experts; therefore, the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

8. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

9. That the government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

10. That maintenance of the public credit, protection to all loyal citizens, and justice to Indians are essential to the honor and safety of our nation.

11. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice-president of the United States.

THE POLICY OF THE LODGE. HOW CAN WE DEFEAT IT?

The lodge cannot stand alone; it is too contemptible to do that. It will therefore probably ally itself with one of the two leading parties, and seek to control it, as it always has done for the last sixty years. As neither party will venture to do without the lodge, both parties, as usual, will select lodge-members for their Presidential candidates.

But no member of the American party can vote for a lodge member for President. Our American party cannot sacrifice American principles as the other parties do for the sake of getting lodge support. We cannot respect ourselves as American citizens and vote for a lodgeite for President.

If the lodge selects Grand Inspector General Butler, 38d degrees, for the Democratic candidate for President, the Republicans will doubtless select some equally noted Freemason for their candidate. We Americans cannot support either party unless it agrees to select out-and-out Anti-masons for its candidates. If we remain true to our principles we may either enforce this condition; or, what is better, we could hold the balance of power in our own hands.

Onr motto should be—Men of American principles should govern America.

We must be utterly opposed to Back-pay grabs, Credit Mobilier Swindlers, Land jobs, Star-route frauds, Fraudulent pensions, Creek-and-Swamp bills, Indian war outrages, Debased coinage, High Tariffs, High Taxes, Squandered resources, and almost all that has characterized the Republican party.

We must appropriate public lands for public education.

We must require our Mongols to be educated in our public schools before they can vote.

Ship canals where the interests of commerce demands them.

Standard currency, Gold.

African colonization encouraged.

And above all, never to lose sight of the fact that the greatest danger to republican government lies in secret associations. AMERICAN.

VOTING BY AID OF A STRING.

It has remained for Ald. Jones and a Republican elector for the Third Ward to invent a novel way to vote. In the brick building on Pearl street, directly opposite the Third Ward polling-place at the city hall, lives an old and feeble man, who was unable to get out to vote. A large piece of string was given to him, and he tied his ballots on the end of it. He then raised the window and let them down to the ground. Ald. Jones took the ballots in his hand, and, holding them above his head, carried them and the string to which they were fastened across the street to the polls, the old man having hold of the other end of the string. The inspectors took the ballots, untied them, looked at the man holding the string in the window across the road, and deposited them in the ballot-box,—Utica Herald.

MAKE THE WHISKY PAY.

A saloon keeper in Massachusetts was forbidden by the wife of a drunkard to sell him liquor; the saloon man laughed her to scorn, and said he would sell him whisky as long as he could pay for it. But one day the drinker fell under the wheels of a locomotive, lost his legs, was disabled for life: and then the wife sued that saloon keeper and made him pay her $7,500 to make good her husband's disability.

The question now is: suppose grog shops cannot be suppressed (which seems preposterous), will the next best move be to secure an able prosecuting attorney in every town to sue the saloon keepers in every case when they damage a man by selling him whisky? The decent inhabitants of any town can combine to secure such a prosecutor, so that the work may be effectually done, whether the wives and children are themselves able to do it or not. Let us have an anti-whisky prosecutor in each town, and let the combination to sustain him be a strong and earnest one.—Justice.

THE EARLY PRESIDENTS of the United States lived long. Washington 67, John Adams 90, Jefferson 83, Madison 85, Monroe 73, J. Q. Adams 80, Andrew Jackson 78, Van Buren 80. Since Mr. Van Buren their lives grow shorter.

Temperance.

SHALL WE PUT CIDER IN THE PLEDGE?

Said a lady recently, when the pledge of abstinence from all intoxicating drinks was read to her: "There is no harm in cider. I use it in mince pies and I shall not give it up." Other ladies expressed the same opinion. Many people believe there is no harm in it, at least not for weeks after it is made, and perhaps not then to any great degree. But not experience alone, but scientific investigation has settled the question of harmfulness.

Alcohol is the product of fermentation, the decay of sugar in grains or fruits. This process of fermentation begins almost immediately after the cider has left the press. The State Assayer of Massachusetts says: "I detect alcohol in cider generally when it is twenty-four hours old—sooner still when the apples are much decayed. Often fermentation begins about as soon as the juice is expressed, both hot weather and advanced decay hastening the process."

Cider contains from five to ten per cent of alcohol, nearly as much as beer and wine. Hence, those who use cider after it has stood for a day are using an intoxicating drink. But people often say, "There is so little alcohol in it, it cannot do harm." The question is not how little alcohol one can use and not create an appetite for it or do injury to the system, but, can we use any alcohol without danger of these results? The fact that there is but little alcohol in cider leads people to drink more than they would of stronger drinks, and hence in the end they get enough to do harm.

It makes no difference what alcohol is mixed with, whether juice from apples, grapes, barley, corn, rye, or simply diluted with water as proof spirits; the principle is the same. It is the alcohol in all these drinks that does the harm. Nobody would think of drinking the impure water that composes the greater part of nearly all intoxicants were it not for the alcohol that is in them. That is what creates the appetite and does the injury. Take that out and rumsellers would go out of business.

This same principle is in cider very shortly after it is made, hence the appetite for alcohol can be as readily formed by drinking cider as by drinking beer. It does not matter how little alcohol one habitually takes, the evil effect is the same, be it more or less, and although it works slowly it works surely. Though one takes but a little, and that disguised in apple juice, it is none the less dangerous, for it is the beginning of a series of paralyzing effects upon his system which will eventually destroy him.

Cider does make men drunk. Many a crime has been committed under the influence of cider. In one temperance town where no saloon was allowed, a man sold sweet cider at his shop, and young men and boys were frequently arrested for being drunk and disorderly, yet they only drank sweet cider.

People may indulge in the use of this beverage for a life time and not become drunkards, but in many, many sad cases the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children. How many a mother has found to her sorrow, when it is too late, that her boy learned the love of alcohol from her mince pies and wine sauces. How few parents realize that this taste is inherited, and that the child will not be content with a weak dilution of alcohol. He must have something stronger, and so parental indulgence in "harmless cider" has paved the way to a drunkard's grave for his idolized child.

Let us, then, if not for our own sakes, at least for others, say with the Apostle: "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth or is offended or is made weak."

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, APRIL 12, 1883.

ANOTHER BIOGRAPHICAL NUMBER of the Cynosure is in preparation, which will equal the last in interest and no doubt surpass it in importance. In addition to these attractive features which will appear at stated periods, our columns have been filled of late with some of the best contributions that we have ever published. It will be the effort of editors and correspondents to maintain the high standard now attained and continually to improve upon it. Corresponding to this effort there should be renewed zeal on the part of every friend of the reform to extend its influence by sending in new subscribers.

EDITORIAL LETTERS.

THE LODGE BEGINS TO STRIKE.

Washington, April, 2, 1883.

I yesterday (Sabbath) attended church in the Sixth Presbyterian church here, assisting in the exercises both in the pulpit and at the communion. Fourteen persons united with the church, and it was a very good and profitable meeting. The minister, Rev. Mr. Burdick, asked me to lunch with him after meeting, and taking my address said he should call on me. I could not dine with him as I had to go to the funeral of our Mr. Ford's son, who was buried at half past 2 o'clock. I send you a Republican of this morning which gives a tolerably fair account of the scene at the funeral, when it is considered that it is made up by a secret society man, from a congregation crammed with Knights of Pythias and others of the 247 secret orders in this city.

Young Mr. Ford was a member of three secret societies. The chaplains of two of them were there with their ritual books, and one of them came to me three times to crowd himself in and take charge of the funeral at the house, saying, "We have but few exercises here," etc.; and wished to know "what part" I wished to take. I sent him to Mr. Ford, who, I told him, had asked me to preach, and had just told me that the pastor of the church (Methodist Protestant) was pleased to have me do so. I told the chaplain that I had no wish to take any part in the exercises, only such as the family desired. The chaplain then went to Mr. Ford, who told him, in my hearing, that he respected him as a man and a chaplain of the Dashaway Temperance Club, of which Mr. Ford is a member. "But," said he, "I wish to have no secret society come between me and my dead. Christ said nothing in secret, and I wish to have my son receive a Christian burial." Then the chaplain came back to me and wished to squeeze himself in; put his hand on his book and said he wished to "read a few Scriptures," etc., etc. I said again, calmly, "I am here at the invitation of Mr. Ford, and you must get your directions from him and from the pastor of the church."

I offered a short prayer, and we went to the church. Young Mr. Ford was in the Government printing office; and the church was filled with members of secret orders, with a sprinkling of persons opposed to these orders. Before taking my text I said, "Several persons have spoken earnestly to me, and minds are agitated about what I am to say. To quiet all apprehension, I wish to say, before preaching, that this church has not been engaged, and a funeral is not the place to discuss secret societies, and I shall therefore say nothing on that subject. I have preached in the First Presbyterian church since I came here; have taken part in temperance meetings in the Masonic and Odd-fellow's Halls; and spoken in the Fruit-grower's Club and at a public reception; and I have now come from the Sixth Presbyterian church where I have assisted in the public services. In none of these places have I alluded to secret societies. If that subject is to be discussed it will be hereafter, in some hall or church; and Gen. Albert Pike, who is a lawyer and scholar, can be present, not to defend his order, which he is forbidden to do, but he can show any errors or mistatements if any are made. It is well known that I have come to this city to discuss secret societies, and I make these remarks to explain why I say nothing on the subject, and to quiet the minds of this audience."

I then took a text, 1 Tim. 1: 10, and proceeded to show how and in what sense Christ "hath abolished death." The audience was interested, and the pastor seemed to enjoy the services much. I had spoken about ten or fifteen minutes when a lady, who has a trouble with her throat, cried out, "I'm fainting! I'm fainting!" I asked to have windows opened, and they were. The house was thrown into confusion by this incident, and men came to me and said, "The family don't want you should preach; let that other minister finish." The pastor who was with me in the pulpit advised me to discontinue here, and complete the services at the grave. I told him I presumed those who were now agitated would object, and, asking him to go to the grave, I quietly left and came home. The Masonic version you get in this morning's Republican, which I send herewith. As I left the house a Knight of Pythias said to me, "Why, what is the trouble? I was interested, and wished to hear you through." J. B.

"THE HOUSE OF THE TEMPLE."

April 4th—I send for publication entire, Gen. Pike's article below. Let the readers of the Cynosure study and ponder it. Gen. Pike's relation to the Rebellion shows what he thinks of the United States Republic; our readers know his relation to temperance, and his friends here say he is translating the Vedas, which are Robert Ingersoll's Bible. Gen. Pike has been Graud Commander of the Supreme Council" of Masons for twenty-four years, being elected for life in 1859. The long article below is the second since I came. It is in the Star of March 24. If our readers do not see that Masonry means the certain destruction of our Republic they will read in vain.

THE HOUSE OF THE TEMPLE.

As stated in the Star of Saturday, Albert Pike and William M. Ireland, respectively, Grand Commander and Secretary General of the Supreme Council of the 33d degree of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of Freemasonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States have purchased from Mr. Samuel E. Middleton, for the Supreme Council, the building erected some twelve years ago by Col. Wright Rives, at the corner of 3d and E streets northwest, for $17,000; and it will hereafter be "The House of the Temple" of the Supreme Council. This body has exclusive jurisdiction over the Rite in all the States formerly known as the slave States, except Delaware, and in all the States and Territories west of the river Mississippi. When full it is composed of thirty-three Inspectors General of the different States and Territories, who hold their offices for life and fill vacancies in their own number. It administers and governs the degrees from the 4th to the 32d, having no control over Blue or Symbolic Masonry and no connection with Royal Arch or Templar Masonry. It was established at Charleston, S. C., as the Supreme Council of the United States, on the 31st of May, 1801; and in 1814 created the Supreme Council for the Northern Jurisdiction at New York, of which Henry L. Palmer of Milwaukee, is at present Grand Commander. General Albert Pike was elected Grand Commander for life in January, 1859, and is now over 73 years of age. Among the present members are Hon. Henry M. Teller, of Colorado, Secretary of the Interior, and Hon. Buren R. Sherman, governor of Iowa, elected in October last. Hon. W. W. Upton, Second Comptroller of the Treasury, is an honorary member. John C. Breckenridge and Robert Toombs were active members—the former until his death, the latter having resigned. The Supreme Council possesses a library of some seven thousand volumes, composed in largest measure of books of value, of the most costly editions and costly binding—historical, scientific, religious, philosophical; of poetry, the drama and literature, as well as Masonic, which is constantly being increased by purchase.

The Supreme Council has printed and published for the use of the bodies and brethren of the Rite, since 1865, twenty-five volumes of rituals, ceremonies and other works, most of them stereotyped, and many of them costly and beautiful, and that the printing of its books of music alone, not yet completed, costs it over $3,500. Of some costly works not more than 100 copies were printed, and these are now worth from $25 to $50 a volume. Several copies of one work have been sold a $100 each. The new "House of the Temple" will be at once occupied by the Supreme Council, and its future sessions (biennial) will be hereafter held there, the next in October, 1884, and it will at once erect a library building on the portion of the premises not covered by the main building.

Subjoined is a roll of its officers and members: Grand Commander, Albert Pike, Washington, D. C.; Lieutenant Grand Commander, James Cunningham Batchelor, New Orleans, La.; Grand Prior, ad interim, Philip Crosby Tucker, Galveston, Texas; Grand Chancellor, Henry Buist, Charleston, S. C.; Grand Minister of State ad interim, Thomas Hubbard Caswell, San Francisco, Cal.; Secretary-General, William Morton Ireland, Washington, D. C.; Treasurer-General, Frederick Webber, Louisville, Ky.; Grand Almoner, Luke Edgar Barber, Little Rock, Ark.; Grand Auditor, Samuel Manning Todd, New Orleans, La.; Grand Constable, Erasmus Theodore Carr, Leavenworth, Kan.; Grand Chamberlain, Martin Collins, St. Louis, Mo.; First Grand Equerry, Odell Squier Long, Wheeling, W. Va.; Second Grand Equerry, Robert Carrel Jordan, Omaha, Neb.; Grand Standard Bearer, Wilmot Gibbes De Saussure, Charleston, S. C.; Grand Sword Bearer, John Lonsdale Roper, Norfolk, Va.; Grand Herald, Gilmor Meredith, Baltimore, Md.; Theodore Sutton Parvin, Iowa City, Iowa; James Smyth Lawson, San Francisco, Cal.; Achille Regulus Morel, Galveston, Texas; DeWitt Clinton Dawkins, Jacksonville, Fla.; Michel Eloi Girard, Vermilionville, La.; Dr. John Mills Browne, U. S. Navy, Washington, D. C.; Charles Frederick Brown, San Francisco, Cal.; Hon. Henry Moore Teller, Central City, Col.; Robert Strachan Innes, Minneapolis, Minn.; Hon. Buren Robinson Sherman, Vinton, Iowa.

WHAT IS ANTI-LODGERY?

Everything here is tinged and tainted with the virus of the secret lodge system. Business, politics, temperance, insurance, but especially religion, all are infested with organizations, names, ceremonies, borrowed from the lodge.

In the large Congregational church, whose pastor, Dr. Rankin, is said not to be a Mason, on the 22nd of February, an "entertainment" was given by the Goodwill Commandery of the United Order of the Golden Cross. I asked ex-Senator Pomeroy what this "Commandery" "Order" was. But though a member of the congregation, and his wife a member of the church, he could give me no information concerning it. It is, he thinks, a secret association with names taken from the lodge, and as usual professing benevolence.

In the early centuries of persecution while Christianity was struggling with the old pagan worships, it was common to place a grain of incense in the hand of a Christian and stretch the hand over the altar of Jupiter. And if such Christian let the incense fall on the altar, his or her life was spared. But if the muscles of the hand were not relaxed, the person was remanded to prison, and reserved for execution. The lodge names, "Commandery," "Order," etc., with a veil of secrecy, ever so thin, are sufficient incense to satisfy the god of the lodge, who was and is the god of paganism, and who is "the prince of this world," the enemy, rival and antagonist of Jesus Christ. What would have been thought of the patriotism of Union chaplains, who should have gone about sewing patches of gray on the blue uniform of Union soldiers! It were easy to multiply instances of this sort, where Christians who abhor the lodge are induced to wear patches of the livery of "the image of the beast." Verily, the time has come when "they will deceive, if possible, the very elect." Let us pray that the days may be shortened. For "except the days be shortened, there shall no flesh be saved."

It is a misnomer to speak of the opposition to lodgery as "Anti-masonry." It is standing for Christ and his atonement against Satan's substitutes for it. It is a fearful mistake to suppose such scraps of lodgery unimportant and trivial. They are not trivial. If they were, they would not be pressed everywhere and into every lodge-hating church. But the image of the beast has "the power of the beast." And we read (Rev. 19: 20) that they that receive merely "the mark of the beast," with those who "worship his image," shall be "cast into the lake of fire." J. B.

NO ROYAL ROAD TO WASHINGTON.

If any have anticipated for our reform any easy entry into the capital of the nation; its gates wide open; its streets accessible; its buildings adaptable, "swept and garnished" for our use; its citizens hospitable, eager to hear our lecturers, read our publications, entertain our conventions, and help forward our great and holy cause, it is because they have forgotten that the devil does not give up a citadel of such importance and impregnability for the mere asking. The work that has been done by a number of devoted and earnest friends on the ground, and by the few brethren who have been opening the way by public discussion of the lodge has been only a skirmishing fire. God has wonderfully opened a way for the reform to secure a temporary foothold in the city, and the advantages gained are most important, and foretell a triumph for the truth; but the legions of dark spirits that receive the worship of the lodge and guard the citadel of its political power are ready, full armed with malediction, falsehood, vile slander aud malignant hate. The events of the past week show that they are ready for the onset, and the battle has begun in earnest.

Many readers of this paper have read the everywhere published dispatches saying that the editor of the Cynosure began a denunciation of secret societies in a funeral discourse in Washington on Sabbath, April 1st, that thereupon mourners went into hysterics and fainted, friends were outraged, and the audience indignantly forced him to desist and let another finish the services. Some whom we hope will learn to be less credulous have half believed the story or feared there might be some basis for it; but we are confident that most of them would remember that the newspaper correspondents were probably not one of them present, but got their information second hand from excited people and avowed enemies, and that to many of them it would be pleasure to add as much as possible to the malignity of the story, and they would also remember that the speaker would be the last one to speak a word that could offend his aged friend and co-laborer, the father of the deceased. But we must not judge too severely when the Inter Ocean was so befooled as to print an editorial on "Invading the Tomb" (!) wherein it is said that the speaker turned aside during his remarks to begin "a series of invectives against secret societies" with "vehemence and hatred;" and even the autocratic Nation of New York has thought the matter of enough importance to repeat the lying scandal in a news item. So has spread this "viperous slander"

> ——"Whose tongue
> Out-venoms all the worms of Nile; whose breath
> Rides on the posting winds, and doth belie
> All corners of the world."

The smoke is clearing away and we see the origin of all this calumny and outcry. Washington papers confirm the truth of our editorial correspondence: that the deceased was a member of three secret lodges, the Grand Army, the Knights of Pythias and order of Mechanics; that these societies were anxious for recognition and display, and were angry at the firm refusal; that the fact that one who exalted Christ and his example against the secret orders was chosen to officiate instead of their chaplains, did not appease their feelings, so that even the very proper word of explanation and notice that their darling lodges should not be disturbed, even this was made to appear to outsiders as a vituperative attack upon them; that there was nothing in the discourse to cause trouble, had any one else been preaching; that the disturbance did not begin for a quarter of an hour after the word of explanation had been spoken, when a majority of the audience with the pastor of the church were listening with quiet attention; that the vexed and disappointed lodge leaders took advantage of a momentary commotion to break up a quiet service, to interrupt and stop a funeral discourse, in a church where they did not belong, but had crowded with their members, and whose pastor had cheerfully given the pulpit and sat by the side of the speaker.

This is the essential fact of the case. The lodges broke up the meeting with no possible provocation except that one who opposes them was conducting it. The thing that enraged them was that they knew the speaker to be by conviction against the follies and falsehoods of the lodge. It is the old story of the wolf accusing the lamb of riling the water.

But enough. This lie has "run from Maine to Georgia." The lodges in every corner of the land gloat over it. But the truth will get on its boots. The battle has begun in earnest, and the prize of the victor is no less than the control of our government. The National Association has gained a conditional footing in Washington; but the lodge is already entrenched, with batteries mounted and magazines filled; there is no remnant of power and influence in the church, in society, or in politics that is not covered with its stride. With this monster of despotism, deception and corruption we have declared war as perpetual as that which Hannibal swore against Rome, and the righteous curse of heaven will fall on us if we draw back. Our movement toward Washington, if it is not a meaningless bravado, is for the redemption of the nation from the lodge curse: so great is the issue that hangs in the balance. Banish the thought that men who own the name American, and boast of sires who willingly offered themselves upon the altar of truth should forget their duty in this hour. The advantage we have gained under God must be held AND SECURED. Our Secretary must not appeal in vain nor long for the means "to fasten the nail in a sure place," and get a clear and full title to the Washington property. This is our first duty in this matter. This business complete, we shall not wait for other work. Providence will open the way for us. This step taken, we shall see where to take the next. Truth will get on its boots, and the fact will mean something. An efficient agency in Washington means war that ceases not for seasons or for truce until the lodge system is driven from among men. Who will hold back in such an hour as this?

MICHIGAN MEETING.—All friends expecting to attend the Michigan State Convention at Grand Rapids, April 17–19, are desired to send their names to P. Ekster, care of W. Brink, Spring St., Grand Rapids, Mich., and entertainment will be provided.

—Bro. Chas O. Wilson, editor and publisher of Gath Rimmon, has lately left St. Louis to reside in Cincinnati with his family, who have for some time been in the latter city. He asks for a sub-headquarters at Cincinnati, and engages to be one of 400 to raise $25 each for the Washington fund.

—On the day after the papers of Washington and the whole country were printing false and malicious reports respecting President Blanchard, the stated meeting of the Presbyterian ministers of the capital welcomed him to their number and by vote made him a corresponding member of the Presbytery.

—Secretary Stoddard returned to this office on Monday afternoon in good health. His son, who was assisting Bro. Starry in Belvidere last week, was arrested by a Masonic officer at midnight, after the meetings were over, and next morning fined by a Masonic justice for the alleged offense of selling books and getting subscribers for the Cynosure. Noble representatives of a noble order!

—The Boston Herald is very funny over the announcement, which proceeds from its own imagination, that the American party cannot find "men big enough" for its nominations outside of Illinois. It has put our general Secretary upon the ticket as Vice-President. Probably the Boston mob three years ago so confused the Herald's memory that it has not yet recovered.

—The venerable Peter Cooper died on Wednesday last at his home in New York, after a brief illness. He had but a short time ago celebrated his 93d birth-day, and was said to be the last link that connects New York with George Washington, for he was a boy of nine when the first President died, and he saw Washington on his last visit to New York. His efforts to ameliorate the discomforts and dispel the ignorance of the laboring classes of New York will long perpetuate his memory.

—It may be generally said that Freemasons who adhere to the order are contemptible in proportion as light and truth are proclaimed about them. The little squad at Wheaton, Ill., that with much ado maintains the name of "lodge," is no exception. The dispatch from Washington telling how lodge men broke up a funeral, but laying it to Pres. Blanchard, was grand news for them. Now they could rejoice over the enemy of their order. Glory! "Hail Masonry, divine!" Spread the glad tidings! So some of the wiser ones (but few were able to do as much) got up a dispatch rehearsing the falsehoods telegraphed from Washington, and sent it out through the State for the edification of the craft. But such men should remember a fearful thing spoken of "whosoever loveth and maketh a lie."

THE WASHINGTON BUILDING.

[From the Sword, Washington, D. C.]

We congratulate the anti-secresy reform movement in its acquisition of a valuable and substantial edifice in this city, to be used as the "headquarters" of this branch of the work. May the Lord bless the undertaking and give it abundant success in all things, for Jesus' sake! Amen. The building, a wide, four-story one, is on 4½ street, nearly opposite the great "Metropolitan" M. E. church house; in the square just north of Pennsylvania avenue, the principal thoroughfare, and but a few "blocks" or "squares" from the U. S. capitol building itself. When fully ready for use the place will have cost, it is said, about $10,000. Thus "a battery" is planted in the national capital, which we trust will vigorously open and continue its fire upon "the enemy" until an unconditional surrender shall be forced upon them. May God speed the good work!

REFORM NEWS FROM 5th., PAGE.

gentleman replied that since that trial the defendant acknowledged that he was guilty.

Three nights thereafter I lectured again at Spring Grove, to a full and attentive house. County Superintendent Smythe, C. H. Isely, Esq., and a great many other intelligent, conscientious-thinking people were present. At its close the question was asked, "What do you think the Masons will do with you for leaving and opposing them?" I replied, "I do not know. Good men are not thugs or assassins; but if the Grand Elect Knights of Kadosh, or White and Black Eagle have the slightest regard for their Masonic oaths, and choose to regard me as a Masonic traitor, and God permits them, I'll soon be 'where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.' Until then I'm on the witness-stand 'for Jesus and for the word of God.'"

Bro. Thompson followed, and read an extract from the Missouri Grand Lodge Report, and commented upon its double-dyed treason. He uprooted the acacia with a firm hand, exposing the corruption beneath it.

The next night Rev. C. Coleman took me to my next appointment, which was at Tranquil school-house, where I spoke to a large and attentive audience, Bro. Coleman following with some well-timed remarks. Bro. Thompson followed, and if those people who listened so patiently to us all did not get enough anti-secrecy at one sitting, they have only to complain and we will finish, if it takes every night for a week. As we closed, a gentleman came forward and requested me to give them a lecture in his neighborhood some miles away. But I could not do so, as I cannot spare time from other duties.

To-day, gentlemen from Oneida sent me word that any time I could come, they would have a hall or church in readiness, and would be glad to have me lecture there. In fact, I could be going all the time, and would be, too, could I but spare time from other duties. But my family must be cared for, and as I do all in this conflict for the glory of Christ and the honor of his word, not charging a penny for it, I have to attend to other business to keep up expenses. Bros. Coleman and Thompson likewise labor without money and without price. Bro. Avery gave me two dollars, as he said, "to help along a good cause." I write this to explain a season of silence that may follow soon, as the business of the season is at hand, and not because I ever expect to charge a cent for my insignificant contributions to so grand a cause. I believe that the seal of Almighty God is on this movement for the overthrow of lodge despotism, false worship and blasphemy.

It is to be seen in "the attentive ear" which the people lend to its truths; it is experienced in "the instructive tongue," given to men who have never been in a lodge, but are learned in its secrets. But the presence of the Holy Spirit bearing witness to the truth in our hearts, while in the conflict, is the harbinger of victory. Some one sent me a copy of the American Freeman, and also an excellent compilation of Masonic Jurisprudence. Both I have used in public with good effect, I hope. The Freeman is thus a monitor and supply ship combined, throwing hot shot, chain shot, grape and canister, into the devil's forts, and supplying ammunition to little batteries on the shore. More anon. Yours in Christ,

GEO. T. DISSETTE,
Seceding Master Mason.

FROM THE WISCONSIN STATE AGENT.

To all the friends opposed to secret societies in Wisconsin:

GREETING:—As I was appointed your State Agent at your annual meeting last fall, I commenced work in December and worked about two and one-half months in the counties of Green and La Fayette, and some little in Grant county. I would say that my present intentions are, as soon as the roads get settled so I can get out, to commence a summer campaign in the counties of Iowa, Grant, Crawford, Richland, Vernon, La Crosse, Monroe, Sauk, and others north of these if I have time. I hope all that have means at their disposal will help us as they can, and also with their prayers and also by planning for lectures. I would be glad to preach two or three times on every Sabbath and lecture four or five times through the week. I have given the counties about in the order I intend to visit them. I suppose these counties have had but little work done in them and shall therefore be able to raise but little money to carry on the work, so let every one do as well as they can. If all will do as well as one brother (Martin) has I shall not lack of funds, he has already given $50. But let not the lack for funds deter any who want lectures from letting me know their wants. If they can obtain a place to hold them in and keep me and horse free of expense I will run the risk of the rest; not but what we shall need more funds than we can get on such new fields, but I think people are generally willing to pay those that labor for them.

Yours as ever, I. BANCROFT.

THE FIRE SPREADING.

BELVIDERE, Ill., April 2d, 1883.

DEAR EDITOR:—The readers of the Cynosure will be interested in the progress of our work in northern Illinois. I commenced canvassing Monday, March 12. The first week was spent in Wheaton, Turner, Bloomingdale, Lombard and Prospect Park, where were sold a number of books, over 30 trial subscriptions taken, tracts distributed, etc. Next I went to Kingston, where I found Bro. Worcester rather poor in health, but strong in the Lord and the power of his might, fighting, (to use his own words) "the sum of all villainies." Kingston is a stronghold of Satan. The pastor of the M. E. church is a reader of the Cynosure, and sees the evils of Masonry in his own church.

Bro. Worcester took me in his buggy and we went to see several prominent men in regard to having Bro. Starry come and work the degrees. Chapman's Hall, the largest in Kingston, was secured. Bills were struck off, and by the untiring zeal of Bro. Worcester were well circulated. The day came for the meeting, and also a snow storm. Some of the fraternity sneeringly said the elements were against us.

Bro. Starry arrived on the 10 o'clock train, came into the depot and inquired for a hotel. He found some Masons who (supposing him to be a brother) were glad to give the desired information. In the course of the conversation, one of the most talkative commenced to give him the news. He, pointing to one of the bills, said that he thought if that man Starry came to work the degrees he would be egged. The lodge would say they had nothing to do with it, and lay it all to the boys. Just then I chanced to come to the depot. The talkative Mason remarked, "There comes Worcester's second." I came in, shook hands with Bro. Starry, and inquired if he had his little white aprons along? As we left the depot the badly sold Mason commenced to curse and swear. But it was too late. When meeting time came the sky was clear. Although the roads were very muddy, there were present the first evening about 300 persons. With slight exception quiet prevailed during the whole of the exercises. Bro. Starry tried in every way to get the ancient and honorable fraternity to vindicate themselves, but they kept their jewel.

On the second evening the hall was crowded. An unusually large number of ladies were present. Several who had never taken sides before, expressed themselves strongly against Masonry. I will assist Bro. Starry in working the degrees here this evening. "If the Lord be for us, who can be against us." W. B. STODDARD.

The Home.

THE PRAYER FOR REST.

Jesus, give me rest from sinning;
Pardon, purify my soul;
Heal my wounds and make me whole;
Now thy blessed work beginning,
Jesus, give me rest from sinning.

Jesus, give me rest from sorrow,
Let my heart lean hard on thee;
Then, though dark my future be,
I shall no more trouble borrow;
Jesus, give me rest from sorrow.

Jesus, give me rest from thirsting;
Broken cisterns but betray,
Worldly springs no thirst allay;
Lead where living wells are bursting;
Jesus, give me rest from thirsting.

Jesus, give me rest from fearing;
Sheltered by thy loving arm;
Satan vainly seeks my harm;
By thy gracious presence cheering,
Jesus, give me rest from fearing.

Jesus, give me rest from doubting;
Help me, Lord, for I believe,
Every promise to receive;
Armed with faith, these legions routing,
Jesus, give me rest from doubting.

WEEK-DAY SERMONS.

BY E. E. FLAGG.

"I am always in a puzzle," sighs a dear young Christian friend. "There are so many differing opinions among really good people about such things as dress, and keeping the Sabbath, and following the social customs of those around us that it is hard to draw any dividing line. I wish that Christians everywhere thought alike on these subjects."

"And supposing they did?" I ask, feeling disposed to turn aside for a moment and have a quiet, familiar talk on this very practical and important point—How a Christian is to know his duty in all circumstances and under all disguises.

"Why then we should have a fixed standard and always know what to do. I should know just how much trimming it is right for me to put on a dress, and whether such and such a book is Sunday reading, and whether this or that social custom is right for a Christian to follow. It would save so much perplexity to have a fixed rule about these matters."

Said a good and great man whose name, if it were proper to write it here, would be one well known to many of my readers: "I would not set up my own individual opinion that Sunday driving is wrong, but I go with the majority of good Christian people who have so decided."

Now with all respect to his memory, and granting as I certainly do, that whatever thing the church as a whole discountenances must find in that fact one of the strongest possible arguments against it, let me ask, is there not a higher standard to follow than even the opinions of the majority of good Christian people? The church is fallible. Sometimes she strikes hands with the world; sometimes the white robe of her first espousals is draggled in the mire of earthliness and Mammon worship; sometimes she refuses to testify against popular sins, and when she ought to warn and rebuke keeps silence till her candle gives but a doubtful glimmer, and sinners say scoffingly, "What is the difference between the church and the world?"

At its highest and purest estate the church is not our pattern. Looking to Christians when we should look to Christ has let in many a soul-destroying error.

St. Paul tells us to "go on to perfection;" and there is one noticeable peculiarity with all Christians who are earnestly trying to follow his counsel. They are not generally much troubled by the dress, or the amusement, or the social custom question. Whatever hinders their way they brush aside, as easily as the bird shakes the dew from its plumage when it mounts heavenward. They cannot afford to stop in their way towards the goal, and deliberate how far it is possible for them to go with the world and not come short at last. There is a way to cut the Gordian knot of all such difficult problems, and the earnest Christian striving after holiness is sure to find it out. He does not go with the world at all.

Would a loving, obedient child who had lived all his life in the closest daily intercourse with a wise and loving parent be very often perplexed to know that parent's will even in comparatively small matters? When I hear Christians complain of the difficulty in deciding such questions—or in other words, of deciding how much or how little it is admissible to follow the world—I am constrained to think that they live too far from their Father's presence, that they are not on those terms of unreserved and affectionate intimacy which would render any serious mistaking of his will impossible.

There is one grand test by which all these so-called minor questions of Christian duty may be tried. Whatever hinders your growth in grace, weakens your power with souls, brings even the thinnest film between your heart and Christ, away with it. God hath called you with a heavenly calling, has given you a divine Counsellor, has made a plain path for your feet—only follow it. Keep close to Christ, and the world, the flesh and the devil will keep far from you.

RING THE OLD BELL.

There is a bell in the cathedral of Cologne, made by the melting together of French cannon. It would be a very difficult task indeed to analyze that bell and determine whence the cannon came. Something like this, however, is the task before those who adopt the extreme theories of the rationalistic critics of the Pentateuch. You must be supposed to show in the minute literary traits of this series of documents the dates of their origin, the dates of their combination, and the dates of subsequent editorial supervision. I, for one, think that, even if it were to be granted that documents drawn from many polytheistic nations and ages were the original constituents of the Pentateuch, we have not touched the doctrine of the inspiration of the combined mass at all. The mass is strangely purified from all false doctrine. A divine fire has burned all adulterate elements out of it, and fused the constituents in a combination wholly new. These cannon are one set of objects; melted together into a bell and hung in a cathedral tower they are another object altogether. Mere white dust is one thing; compacted into marble, in a vase, it has a ring, and is quite another. These cannon, melted and hung aloft in the form of a bell, are no longer cannon. They are an inspired work. It is our business, indeed, to know all we can as to the composition of this bronze; but our highest business is to ring the bell in the cathedral tower. The moral law, the ethical monotheism of the Pentateuch, have proved their resonance as often as they have been put into practice, age after age. The Pentateuch hung in the cathedral tower of the world has uttered God's voice, and it is our business to ask how we can ring the bell in the heights of history, rather than how it originated by the melting together of many fragments.—Joseph Cook.

MR. RUSKIN ON BIBLE READING.

Mr. Ruskin, in the Fors Clavigera, says: How much I owe to my mother for having so exercised me in the Scriptures as to make me grasp them in what my correspondent would call their "concrete whole," and above all, taught me to reverence them as transcending all thought, and adorning all conduct! This she effected, not by her own sayings or personal authority, but simply by compelling me to read the book thoroughly for myself. As soon as I was able to read with fluency she began a course of Bible work with me, which never ceased till I went to Oxford. She read alternate verses with me, watching every intonation of my voice, and correcting the false ones, till she made me understand the verse, if within my reach, rightly and energetically. It might be beyond me altogether; that she did not care about, but she made sure that as soon as I got hold of it at all, I should get hold of it by the right end, In this way she began with the first verse of Genesis, and went straight through to the last verse of the Apocalypse—hard names, numbers, Levitical law, and all; and began at Genesis next day. If a name was hard, the better the exercise in pronunciation; if a chapter was tiresome, the better the lesson in patience; if loathsome, the better the lesson in faith that there was some use in being so out-spoken. After our chapters, (from two to three a day, according to their length, the first thing after breakfast, and no interruption from servants allowed—none from visitors, who either joined in the reading or had to stay up-stairs—and none from any visitings or excursions, except real traveling) I had to learn a few verses by heart, or repeat, to make sure I had not lost something of what was already known; and with the chapters above enumerated I had to learn the whole body of the fine old Scottish Paraphrases, which are good, melodious and forceful verse, and to which, together with the Bible itself, I owe the first cultivation of my ear in sound. It is strange that, of all the pieces of the Bible which my mother thus taught me, that which cost me the most to learn, and which was, to my child's mind, chiefly repulsive—the one hundred and nineteenth Psalm—has now become of all the most precious to me in its overflowing and glorious passion of love for the law of God.

OUR BOYS AND GIRLS.

FIVE STEPS.

A little sip of cider,
A little sip of beer;
A taste that's rather bitter,
But what is there to fear?

A glass of foaming lager,
A choice perfumed cigar;
It's funny what fanatics
Those temp'rance people are.

Say, boys, here's to our welfare—
May none here lack a dime
To buy a glass of liquor
At any other time.

Say, can't you trust a fellow?
Give us a drop of gin
To stop the dreadful gnawing
That's going on within.

Found dead—a common drunkard!
Alas! how came he there?
It was the beer and cider;
Beware! Beware! BEWARE!

LIVES OF CELEBRATED WOMEN.

OLYMPIA MORATA.

Olympia Morata was born at Ferrara in 1526—a stormy time, when new thoughts and aspirations were waking up in revolt against the long established powers of tyranny and superstition. Even in her childhood Olympia's life felt the unsettled character of the times. Her father, a man highly esteemed both for his learning and his integrity, and a warm adherent of the reformed faith, had come to Ferrara as tutor to the young princes of the house of Este, brothers of the reigning duke. Having published a book in defense of the reformed doctrines, too far advanced for even that liberal atmosphere, he was obliged to leave it for a time and teach at Venice, Vicenza, and other places, whence he was finally allowed to return to Farrara when his daughter Olympia had reached her eleventh year. In the meantime, the eager and enthusiastic child, growing up in a frugal household, and, as Longfellow says, "in the daily round of household cares," with a delicate mother and four younger children at home, had made wonderful progress in the classic tongues, and had even begun the study of science and philosophy, as well as elocution. The fame of her youthful attainments soon spread in a city like Ferrara, and at twelve years of age she was chosen by the Duchess Renee as companion in study of her young daughter, the Princess Anna d'Este. The attractions of court life by no means checked Olympia's ardor for study. She attended—probably with the Princess Anna—the lectures at the university, where ladies seem to have been admitted without difficulty; those of her own father, of Celio Curione, and of the celebrated Chilianus, under whom she made rapid progress in Greek. She wrote dialogues in Greek and Latin, after Plato and Cicero, translated Boccaccio into Latin, and studied philosophy and the art of public speaking under her father's special recommendation, who declared, in a letter to her on the subject, that he would "rather hold his tongue than speak harshly, inartienlately, or unpleasantly." But she learned still more precious lessons under the guardianship of her royal friend. It was probably before her father's return to Ferrara that Calvin had for a time sought refuge there, but the influence of his teaching was still strong at court, and Olympia learned to study her Bible, and draw from it the "living water, of which if a man drink he shall never thirst again." The influence of her own and her father's friend—Celio Curione, a learned and pious refugee from Savoy—helped also to strengthen her faith in Christ and quicken her personal piety.

At the age of sixteen, Olympia, from being a student, was advanced to be a lecturer in the university, an honor unparalled even in these days of "higher education." It may reasonably be doubted whether we shall ever see a young lady of sixteen occupying a chair at Harvard or Yale, or even Cornell; yet Olympia Morata, three centuries ago, lecturing on the Paradoxes of Cicero at the world-renowned University of Ferrara, and lecturing, we may be sure, with the early matured dignity of her earnest character, seems to have excited no perceptible shock of surprise or suspicion of unfitness. In those days, we are told, "there was no notion of rivalry between the sexes, any more than between classes in the State, but all were at liberty to do their best."

For three years more Olympia continued to lead her tranquil student life, and to exert, at the court and the university, the influence of her noble and cultured womanhood. But with her nineteenth year came a change in the political atmosphere of Ferrara, brought about by the watchful jealousy of Rome. Ercole was urged to purge his court of the heretics who abounded there, and notwithstanding the strong sympathies of the duchess he yielded to the pressure. Olympia, being known to be one of the obnoxious class, was obliged to leave the court, and even in her own home, saddened by her father's failing health, was subjected to a most worrying espionage, till she was almost afraid to be seen reading her Bible. Then came the death of her father, her teacher, her friend, and Olympia was left to care for her invalid mother and her little brother and sisters. But amid such altered circumstances she scarcely seemed to regret the more brilliant life she had left behind. For she writes, "God has kindled in me a desire to dwell in that heavenly home in which it is more pleasant to abide one day than a thonsand years in the courts of princess."

But thongh Olympia's nobler resonrces made her independent of conrtly pleasures and lnxuries, they did not make her insensible to the blessings of a true-hearted love. A German student of medicine, a certain Dr. Andrea Grunthler, who had taken his doctor's degree at Ferrara, had fallen in love with Olympia, not apparently standing in any awe of her erndition, and Olympia as warmly returned his love. They were speedily married, and the young doctor went to seek a home where his wife and he conld breathe more freely; his short absence being intensely felt by the young wife. "Yon wonld not believe me," she wrote, "if I were to tell yon how I long for you; nothing so hard or difficnlt that I would not willingly do it to give you pleasure, yet I bear anything for your sake more easily than your absence."

The young couple settled first at Angsburg, Olympia taking with her her little brother, that she might herself carry on his education. Having little congenial society at Augsburg, Olympia found solace and occnpation in translating the Psalms into Greek verse. Ere long, however, they left Augsburg for her husband's native town in Franconia, bearing the nnenphoneous name of Schweinfurth. Here their domestic happiness was too soon disturbed by the ravages of war. Schweinfurth fell a prey to one of the "filibustering" expeditions of the times, and the plagne came to add to the miseries of the inhabitants. Dr. Grunthler was prostrated by this dreadful disease, probably caught in his ministrations on others, and was restored by his wife's devoted nursing, only to escape with her, for his life, from a pillaged and bnrning city. With torn garments and bleeding feet, they found a brief refuge at Hamelberg, where, however, the people were afraid to allow them to remain more than fonr days. Tossed from place to place, they at last fonnd a settled abode at Heidelberg, where Grunthler received from the Elector Palatine an appointment in the university. Olympia, ever thoughtful for the misfortunes of others, made it her first care to seek a servant among her fellow-sufferers, the refugees from Schweinfurth. Her own heaviest loss was that of her precious library and the greater part of her manuscripts. Her literary friends sent her presents of books to replace those lost in the burnt city, and she employed her own leisure in transcribing her lost poems from memory. Here in peace and quiet and religious liberty, in the beautiful city by the Neckar, she conld have lived happily enongh with her beloved and devoted husband. Bnt the shocks she had undergone had undermined her constitntion, and consumption had set its insidious tonch on her frame. So long as her failing strength permitted, she continned to write loving letters of Christian cheer and enconragement to the Ferrara friends still snffering for their faith. To her old friend and teacher, Celio Curione, she wrote, with a last effort, that he mnst not grieve when he should hear the news of her death; "for I know that my life itself will only begin after death, and I wish to be dissolved and be with Christ."

Her hnsband, left so desolate by her death, describes it with a tender eloquence which shows a sonl worthy of the wife he had won. "When she was almost dying, waking a little out of sleep, I saw her look pleased and smile softly. 'I saw just now,' she said, 'a quiet place filled with the fairest and clearest light.' When she could speak no more, throngh weakness, 'Courage,' I said, 'dear wife; in that fair light you will dwell.' Again she smiled and nodded her head. A little while afterward she said: 'I am quite happy.' When next she spoke, her eyes were already dim. 'I can scarcely see you any longer,' she said, 'but everything seems to me fnll of the most beautiful flowers.' They were her last words. Soon after, as if overcome by sweet sleep, she breathed forth her soul."

So passed away, in her twenty-ninth year, a woman quite as remarkable in her day and generation as Margaret Fuller was in hers, and as truly a martyr to her zeal for truth as many who suffered a shorter, sharper doom. In enlightened tolerance she was far before many of her contemporaries, whom in simple, earnest piety and love of Christ, she was in no way behind. Here is a passage from the remains of her writings collected by her friend Celio Cnrione, which would do no discredit to the most enlightened writer in the Christian Union to-day. "Abont the sacraments I know there is amongst Christians a great controversy, which would easily have been settled long ago if men had taken as their connselor, not their own vanity, but Christ's glory and the good of his church, which is advanced by concord."

In the quiet old University chnrch of Heidelberg—a fitting resting-place for her mortal dust—the traveler can still find a plain gray stone, on which, aided perhaps by some wandering ray of sunlight falling amidst the still mediæval repose and "dim religious light," he can trace for himself the inscription that records the name, the learning, and the virtnes of the truly noble lady, Olympia Morata.—Christian Union.

2. That there can be false religions in our own land.

3. That there is only one true way to Heaven.

LESSON HYMN.

Holy Bible, book divine!
Precious treasure, thou art mine!
Mine to tell me whence I came,
Mine to tell me what I am.

Mine to chide me when I rove;
Mine to show a Saviour's love;
Mine thou art to guide and guard;
Mine to punish and reward.

Mine to comfort in distress,
If the Holy Spirit bless;
Mine to show by living faith
Man can triumph over death.

Mine to tell of joys to come,
And the rebel sinner's doom;
O, thou Holy Book divine,
Precious treasure thou art mine.

—A little girl saw hanging in her Sabbath school this text on an illuminated card: "Let us not be weary in well doing; for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not." She caught the idea of its teaching, and in attempting to repeat it at home she gave a somewhat free rendering in this form: "Don't you get tired of doing good; for if you don't faint away, by-and-by you'll get your pay."

The truth as she put it is worth bearing in mind.—Selected.

THE SIGNS OF A TRUE CONVERSION, OR THE NEW CONVERT WORKING FOR JESUS.

1. He prays.
2. He obeys the divine voice to go into the city.
3. He confesses Christ by receiving baptism.
4. He loves the society of Christians.
5. He tells others of Jesns.
6. He grows stronger in faith and love and more Christlike.
7. He longs to know more of Christ, and retires to Arabia for this purpose (Gal. 1: 17–24).
8. He endnres suffering for Christ—both the persecution of the Jews and the mistrust and snspicion of the disciples.

ILLUSTRATIVE NOTES.

"Then was Saul certain days with the disciples." Again we see the operation of the law that like seeks like. While Sanl remained in his native hatred toward the gospel, his only delight was in the society of those who were of like spirit with himself. Now that his nature has been changed, he delights in the fellowship of those who loved the Lord Jesus. Not only did he wish to honor Christ by joining the ranks of the faithfnl, bnt he wanted their sympathy, their prayers and instructions. Although he afterwards writes to the Galatians that he "neither received the gospel of man, neither was he taught it but by the revelation of Jesus Christ," yet he did not despise the strength and assistance he might receive from Christian brethren, even the most hnmble. In his letters afterwards he makes honorable mention of his "helpers in the Lord," and often does he reqnest the prayers of the church. Nor shonld the fellowship of Christians be despised now. No one is so strong that he does not need it. (See the illustration of the yonng man on Mt. Blanc in suggestions to primary teachers.) We need to meet together often that our graces may be kept aronsed, as watchmen keep themselves awake in the night watches by calling one to another.

"Straightway he preached Christ." Saul did not enter at once npon the exercise of the office of the apostleship; he was to undergo a conrse of divine training for this work. From his own example and experience he could well connsel others to "lay hands on no man suddenly." Bnt his overflowing heart could not keep silence. No one who feels the divine call in his heart to preach the gospel will wait nntil his conrse of training is complete to tell others of salvation; he will improve the earliest and every opportunity for telling the glad news. So will every one who has been bronght into the light of salvation.

"All that heard him were amazed." And well they might be, for his fame as a persecntor had filled the city, and they knew that a marvellous change had taken place. From the intensity of his madness against the gospel he had been changed into its most earnest and able defender. They do not seem to have ever doubted the genuineness of this change. No man would stultify himself by acknowledging that his whole former life, so blameless in the eyes of the mass of the Jews, was all wrong; no one wonld give up all his prospects for high honors as one learned in the law and zealous for their traditions; no one wonld run the risk of losing all, even life itself, by espousing the cause of the despised Galileans unless a most thorough change had been wrought in his whole nature. And all we know of his subseqnent life confirms this conclusion. Paul never showed marks of fanaticism, but if he was not a fanatic then a miraculous change must have been wrought in his heart, one which God only could effect.

"Saul increased the more in strength." Growth is one of the best evidences of life. As long as a tree grows we know that it has vitality. Saul kept on growing as long as he lived. Near the close of his life he writes, "I press toward the mark." He had received a vivid revelation of Jesus Christ, and he knew how far short he was of being conformed to his pattern. Are we growing in the Christian graces? If not, can we be alive?

"He assayed to join himself to the disciples, but they were all afraid of him." It was little wonder that they were so afraid when we remember how he had persecnted them. But Sanl did not becanse of this turn away from the Christians, much less from Christ. This must have been one of his severest trials, too. It must have been trying to his sonl to be persecnted by those with whom he had once associated; bnt to be mistrnsted by those for whose cause he had forsaken all must have been even more trying to his faith. But he here, as through all his life, displays his good common sense as well as his Christlike spirit. He knew that it would require clear evidence to make the disciples believe that he was sincere after his former persecution of the church. He was willing to wait until that evidence conld be afforded. He was not like some in our own days who make the apparent coldness of Christians an excuse for not joining the church.

"But Barnabas....declared unto them, etc." Barnabas here proves himself worthy of his name (son of consolation), as he does at many other points in his life. There is need of such service as he here rendered often at the present time. There are timid ones who need a Barnabas to take them by the hand and encouragingly lead them into the fellowship of the disciples. There are those also who are lying under suspicion which another may be able to relieve by showing the groundlessness of the charge, or that a real change appears to have been wrought in the character and life. May we ever be on the alert for opportunities to "lend a hand."—U. P. Bible Teacher.

Lessons. 1. To know Christ we must see him. 2. We can see only a living Christ. 3. When we see him, we mnst know him. 4. When we know him, we must speak of him. 5. Such testimony tells on others. 6. Such testimony increases strength. 7. Such testimony edifies and multiplies the chnrch. 8. Snch testimony exalts and glorifies the risen and coming Christ.—Notes for Bible Study.

PROMPTINGS TO FURTHER STUDY.

When did opposition to Paul cause the gospel of Christ to be preached? How many plots of the Jews to kill Paul are recorded in the book of Acts? Of whom does Paul himself say he learned the gospel he preached? What does he himself say abont his getting new ideas or hints from the apostles in Jernsalem? Whom of the apostles did he go to see there; and for what purpose did he confer with them? Upon what did Paul base his claims to apostleship?—Scholar's Quarterly.

Strange Strike.—A hnndred men, employees of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway, struck some time ago, not for higher wages, bnt for Sabbath. They wanted a day of rest, a day in their homes and chnrches, and they were so much in earnest that they declared that they would give up their place rather than work on the Lord's day.

The Churches.

—Pres. C. A. Blanchard of Wheaton College preached on the Sabbath, morning and evening, in the Chicago Avenue (Moody) church in this city.

—Rev. C. F. Hawley left his home in Wheaton on the 30th ult. for the East, intending to visit the Wesleyan spring conferences in the interest of the Theological Seminary at Wheaton.

—Rev. M. L. Vorheis, for several years stationed at Burlington, Iowa, but lately engaged in work in Missouri, is about to start from Albany, Mo., for San Jose, Cal., to take charge of the Free Methodist work in that city.

—The Tompkins Avenue Congregational Church, Brooklyn, Rev. G. F. Pentecost, pastor, has recently welcomed over a hundred new members, the majority on confession of faith.

—A revival now in progress at Carthage, Mo., has resulted in over five hundred conversions. Religious meetinge are being held throughout the city, and places of amusement are deserted.

—The revival in Delaware, Ohio, is one of unusual interest. Up to this time the number of converts is reckoned at about 460, of whom a little over 200 are students of Wesleyan University.

—There is a general revival among the churches of New Haven, Conn. It is not confined to any denomination. It is said that the work among the Yale students is more than encouraging.

—The supply of acceptable ministers is below the demand, and the religious journals are quite seriously discussing the situation. Not only is there a lack of candidates for places in the far West, but the Congregationalist makes the satatement that twenty-five of the "leading and most commending pulpits" of its denomination in New England are vacant.

—Eleven persons are expected to graduate from Union Biblical Seminary, Dayton, Ohio, at the approaching commencement. President C. J. Kephart, of Avalon College, Missouri, will be one of the orators at the alumnal meeting at the closing of the Seminary.

—The number of students in the Presbyterian theological seminaries during the session soon to close is given by the Presbyterian Banner as follows: Princeton, 125; Union, 129; Alleghany, 74; Auburn, 42; Lane, 36; Chicago, 27; Danville, 7; San Francisco, 6—making a total of 446.

—Rev. R. Loggan, of Clifton, Kansas, is rejoicing in the fact that forty-five converts have been received into the United Brethren classes in his circuit within a short time.

The Reformed Theological Seminary at New Bruuswick, N. J., has been closed on account of measles among the students. When such a disease closes a theological seminary no wonder some of the old saints are sarcastic on the juvenility of the coming ministry.—Baptist Weekly.

—When the ladies of Shelbyville, Ind., began their crusade in 1870, among the saloon-keepers was a Captain Maze, a man who had served with distinction, during the war, in the Federal army. He finally opened his saloon door to the ladies. He gave up his saloon, giving the key to the ladies, and started for Kansas. He is now a very successful revivalist. While at Morristown over 300 persons professed convertion under his ministrations.

—No saloon-keeper can become a member of any of the congregations belonging to the Swedish Augustana synod, and if a person already a member starts in this business, he thereby becomes the object of church disciplinary measures. The synod has reached the conviction that saloon keeping and membership of a Christian church are inconsistent.

—The church buildings among the Indians reported in 1881, including those among the five civilized tribes, were 296. The missionaries, not included among teachers, numbered 184. There were 383 schools, 79 of them boarding-schools. There were expended for education from tribal funds and from the United States Government, from States and religious societies, $584,238, which is probably $13 for each child of school age. The whole number of Protestant missionaries is 71.

—Within the last year the women of the United States have given the magnificent sum of six hundred thousand dollars for the spread of the Gospel in heathen lands. Of this amount the Presbyterians gave nearly $200,000; the Baptists, $156,000; the Congregationalists, $130,000; the Northern Methodists, $108,000; and the women of the Methodist Church, South, $25,110. An examination of the reports of these denominations show that many of their large amounts are made up of small contributions. It illustrates the value of the small mites when aggregated.

—The Evangelical Nestorian Church is the result of labors begun by Drs. Perkins and Grant about fifty years ago. It has become an active and well-equipped ecclesiastical organization. Each church has its pastor and ruling elders. One elder from each church, with all the ministers of both the first and second orders, constitute the local Cnooshya or Presbytery. Of these Cnooshyas there are four which meet triennally by representatives in General Cnooshya or Synod. This latter body consists at present of twenty-four ordained pastors and thirty-five licentiates. There are twelve students for the ministry. Under its care are five self-sustaining churches and fifteen partly self-sustaining, besides sixty stated congregations and forty-three preaching stations. The number of communicants is about 15,000. The church work is carried on by a system of boards. These are three: (1.) The Evangelistic Board, which has the combined functions of the Boards of Home Missions and Church Erection. (2.) The Educational Board, which has oversight of secular as well as religious education, and exercises many of the duties of a City Board of School Directors. (3.) The Legal Board, which has supervision of the civil relations of the Church and its members to the Persian authorities, and of their defense from oppression and injustice. It has a special agent, who acts as attorney with the Government.

—The Moody and Sankey meetings at Nottingham, beginning on Sabbath, February 25th, were held in the Marble Rink, in which seats were provided for 6,000 persons. The first meeting was called for 8 o'clock A. M., and long before that hour "the vast building was crowded to its utmost capacity." The second service was equally thronged, the preponderating element consisting of workingmen. The women's meeting in the afternoon overflowed the rink and filled a neighboring church. The service for men only, in the evening, was crowded. For the three succeeding days the same interest was manifested. From Nottingham the evangelists proceeded to Manchester. The first meeting there was held in Cooke's Circus, and attended by a "great crowd," on a Thursday evening. The next service, on Friday afternoon, was held in the Free Trade Hall, where the audience occupied every available spot. and many could not gain admission. In the evening an overflow meeting was necessary. On the next Sabbath afternoon the Free Trade Hall, Cooke's Circus, and the Y. M. C. A. Hall were all crowded half an hour before the time advertised for service, and still several thousand were left upon the streets, for whom no provision could be made at the time.

IMPORTANCE OF BIBLE STUDY.

A PAPER READ AT THE ANNUAL SABBATH SCHOOL CONVENTION OF BERRIEN COUNTY, MICH., BY J. B. CRALL.

* * * Would we know something about our existence, or from whence those teeming millions of earth originated? We need not resort to the controverted speculations or theories of a Darwin, for in this gift of man, endorsed by the highest authority of all worlds, we have it clearly set forth. Would we know how to mitigate our misfortunes, and make life more agreeable or pleasant by wholesome laws while in this state of probation? We need not search the works of a Paine, a Hume, or a modern Ingersoll; for in this book of books may be found a code of morals, which, if strictly adhered to, would dispense with locks and bolts; the groans of the maimed and dying would no longer be heard on the field of strife; and the dens of iniquity would cease to fill our prisons, our almshouses and other asylums; and universal peace and prosperity far beyond anything that we can conceive or imagine would fill the habitable world. Would we know the design of our being, the purpose for which those faculties of body and mind were bestowed upon us, why man has an intellect of unlimited improvement? No answer to this problem could be found among all the writings of the heathen philosophers of the centuries past. But in this revelation from Him who is above all, and over all, we learn that the representatives of the redeemed "cast their crowns before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." We find what could not be found elsewhere, that the chief end of man is to glorify God.

But we can only arrive at such conclusions, and fit and prepare ourselves for such a service, by carefully studying his revealed Word. We very readily see the importance of fitting ourselves for the various occupations and positions in life. If we intend to devote ourselves to one of the professions, we make the study of that profession a specialty. If we expect to occupy some high position in society or state, and move among the refined and learned, we study the "forms required by good breeding, or prescribed by authority, to be observed in social or official life. Imagine an uncivilized, uncultured, and half-clad savage appearing in one of our refined social circles. All eyes would be turned on the intruder. He would be a gazing stock of surprise. And his embarrassment and want of ease would satisfy his dull mind that he was not in his proper element; not fitted for such society. We read of one with similar unfitness at a marriage feast. He had not on a wedding garment. "And he was speechless."

How can we know how to prepare ourselves to glorify God in our bodies, and our spirits, which are his, without making the study of his Word a specialty? How can we know how to be attired, move, act, and converse in the society of heaven, without studying the etiquette of heaven? God has given us those wonderful faculties of body and mind that they might be adorned from his Word. And if we neglect to make studious use of the Bible, the great text-book in the preparatory department on earth, we will be as ill at ease at the court of heaven as the uncultured savage in refined society, and speechless as the man without the wedding garment. And it is to be feared that the king will say to the servants, "Bind him hand and foot, and take him away, and cast him into outer darkness."

But it is not alone important that we should study the Bible in order that we may be qualified for the associations of heaven, but it is said, "study to show thyself approved unto God, a workman that needeth not to be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth." God has interests to advance, work to do through the agency of man, and the work is not assigned to a select or favored few who are endowed with brilliant talents, or distinguished for their flaming oratory. But all who will may work successfully in some capacity adapted to their several abilities. And often the lowest, and seemingly most ineffective work, may be the foundation upon which some grand achievement rests. But we must study to show ourselves approved unto God. And as there is in this world a moral conflict between right and wrong, a kingdom in opposition to the spiritual kingdom of Christ, and as God works through instrumentalities, it is necessary that we should study the ways and means by which we may be instrumental in subduing the foes of God and man. But we can only know how to arm ourselves with the whole armor of God, and be prepared for the contest by studying the Bible. There is a maxim, that what is worth doing at all in the various vocations of life, is worth doing well; and he who expects to make his mark in the world, is not satisfied by being a mere novice at his trade or profession, but studying to show himself approved unto men. But commendable as this may be, we should above all, study to show ourselves approved unto God. And if we should find that our work is on the watch-towers, or in the nurseries of the kingdom, the Sunday-school and the Christian family, or if we can only hold up hands while contending armies meet, we should study to show ourselves approved unto God, workmen that need not be ashamed.

We are so constituted that we are continually looking forward for something new, new scenes, new discoveries, new acquisitions of knowledge; something to satisfy an inward longing which is ever dissatisfied. But if we do not seek to satisfy this raging thirst from the inexhaustable fullness of God's truth, we may weep as an Alexander, when we have reached the pinnacle of fame; or say, "all is vanity and vexation of spirit," when we have touched the topmost limits of human knowledge. And if, in this age of gospel light and progression (which is all attributable to the influence of the Bible), we cannot see the importance of Bibly study, and say as the Psalmist, "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path," we may say in the near future, "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved."

LITERARY.

"Holden with Cords; or the Power of the Secret Empire."—The republication of the Reform Story which run through the columns of the Cynosure for nearly a year is at last completed, and the book so anxiously expected by thousands of our readers has come from the press of Ezra A. Cook with those exterior attractions that befit a work both popular and intrinsically of great value. Most of our readers have already followed the story from its opening chapters, and it is unnecessary to review it, but they will certainly turn these pages with a revival of the old interest in the experiences of the Severns family in their varied experience with the Masonic order. Many who have but lately begun to read the Cynosure will find in these pictures of the lodge during the trying days of 1826–7, as well as in the quiet of a rural town, to be true to the life, and the vivid impression every thoughtful mind will take from them will never be effaced. The book is finely bound and fairly introduces the reader to the treasures within. The publisher has made occasional selections from Masonic works to verify the statements of the text; these make a helpful addition for some who can afford no more complete an armory of this kind. They would, however, have interfered less with the uniform appearance of the pages had they been thrown into a convenient appendix at the end of the volume. The book is published by Ezra A. Cook at No. 7, Wabash Ave., Chicago, and is also for sale at this office.

In the North American Review for April, the scriptural and the legal aspects of Divorce are presented respectively by the Rev. Dr. Theodore D. Woolsey, well known for his insistance on the indissolubility of the marriage tie, and by Judge John A. Jameson, a jurist whose long experience with divorce cases in Chicago, both on the judicial bench and at the bar, lends to his observations a very special value. Dr. P. Bender, a Canadian who has studied to some purpose the political, social and economic conditions of his country, under the title, "A Canadian view of Annexation," makes a forcible presentation of the reasons which incline many citizens of the Dominion to regard with favor the idea of absorption by the United States. Senator John A. Logan sets forth the need which exists for "National Aid to Public Schools" in the several States and territories. The Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby writes of "The Dangerous Classes" that menace the perpetuity of civil order and the peace of the community, meaning the manipulators of corporation stocks and the men who, having amassed enormous wealth, use it for nefarious purposes. James C. Welling, President of Columbian University, treats of "Race Education," the problem that confronts the philosophic statesman, of the presence in our body politic of a strong Negro contingent. "The Water Supply of Cities" is discussed by Charles F. Wingate, "Ethical Systems" by Prof. F. H. Hedge, "Street Begging" by Rev. Dr. Charles F. Deems, and "Criticism and Christianity" by O. B. Frothingham.

A Frightful Set of Countenances.—Let any one examine the faces of the Phenix Park murderers, as portrayed in our illustrated magazines, and he must be persuaded that such men could easily be led to commit murder. The lodge, with its murderous arts, could play on the passions of such men as easily as the skilled musician plays on the piano. Shakespeare has illustrated this fact by drawing forth from the dregs of society the men who were especially suited to aid Macbeth in ridding himself of honest competitors. Where the lodge has the will to murder, there will always be a way. Where Phenix Park assassinations are plotted, the lodge can always furnish the tools for the purpose.

John Wesley was preaching in a chapel in England, the alter being at the rear, the pews were near the pulpit. A man in the front pew was sound asleep. Wesley dropped the Bible upon his head; the man awakening, looked up to the high pulpit, when Wesley, addressing him, said, "Brother, if you won't hear the word of God, you shall feel it."

There is an apple tree in Rabun county that is probably the largest on this continent. It shades the greater part of a farm yard, and one year the owner gathered 204 bushels of apples from it, besides what his stock destroyed. He received 25 cents per bushel for them from wagoners.—Atlanta Constitution.

A woman was the only passenger in a Montana stage exeept her baby, whom she wrapped in her fur cloak, leaving herself unprotected from the zero temperature. The driver saw that she was benumbed and would freeze to death unless aroused to violent exercise. He dragged her from the coach and left her by the roadside. "Oh, my baby!" she cried. The driver cracked his whip. The stage flew over the snow with the woman running after. The race was kept up for nearly two miles, when the driver took the mother in again and wrapped his coat around her. He had warmed her blood and saved her life.

The United States is said to possess more lawyers to the square mile than any other nation on the globe, and we spend more time and money in litigation than any other civilized people. In Great Britain there is a lawyer to every 3,000 people; in Germany, one to every 3,600, in France one to every 1.600, while in America there is a lawyer to every 800 of us, and they are growing in numbers faster than the Nation is growing in population.

IMITATION BAKING POWDERS.

To the Public:

The public is cautioned against the practiee of many groeers who sell what they claim to be Royal Baking Powder, loose or in bulk, without label or trademark. All such powders are base imitations. Analyses of hundreds of samples of baking powders sold in bulk to parties asking for Royal, have shown them all to be largely adulterated, mostly with alum, dangerous for use in food, and comparatively valueless for leavening purposes.

The public is too well aware of the injurious effeet of alum upon the system, to need further eaution against the use of any baking powders known to be made from this drug; but the dealer's assurance, "Oh, it's just as good as Royal," or "it's the genuine Royal, only we buy it by the barrel to save expense of can," etc., is apt to mislead the unsuspeeting consumers into buying an artiele whieh they would not knowingly use in their food under any consideration. The only safety from sueh practices is in buying baking powder only in the original paekage, of a well known brand, and a thoroughly established reputation.

The Royal Baking Powder is sold only in eans, securely closed with the eom pany's trade-mark label, and the weight of paekage stamped on eaeh eover. It is never sold in bulk, by the barrel, or loose by weight or measure, and all sueh offered the public, under any pretense, are imitations.

If eonsumers will bear these faets in mind, and also see that the paekage purehased is properly labeled, and the label unbroken, they will be always sure of using a baking powder perfeetly pure and wholesome, and of the highest test strength in the market.

A LESSON IN SPELLING.

Since the introduction of Spelling Matches, many words have come prominently into notice —words that were previously, comparatively unknown. For instance, we find Anti-septic, meaning: preventing and stopping all fermentation and decomposition, and Analgesia it: Painkiller. Then there is Anti-pyretic: cooling down inflamation and fever heat. These three words, so often mis-spelled, are three of the cardinal virtues of something that will cure many a bad spell, and that is Salicylica, pronounced Sal-i-cyl-i-ca. Warranted to afford immediate relief, and guaranteed to cure Rheumatism, Gout or Neuralgia.

SECRET!

THE ONLY DISSOLVER OF THE POISONOUS URIC ACID WHICH EXISTS IN THE BLOOD OF RHEUMATIC AND GOUTY PATIENTS.

SALICYLICA is known as a common sense remedy, because it strikes directly at the cause of Rheumatism, Gout and Neuralgia, while so many so-called specifics and supposed panaceas only treat locally the effects.

It has been conceded by eminent scientists that outward applications, such as rubbing with oils, ointments liniments, and soothing lotions will not eradicate these diseases which are the result of the poisoning of the blood with Uric Acid.

SALICYLICA works with marvelous effect on this acid, and so removes the disorder. It is now exclusively used by all celebrated physicians of America and Europe. Highest Medical Academy of Paris reports 95 per cent cures in three days

THE FARM.

TESTING SEEDS.

The practice which has been adopted by several of the agricultural colleges, of testing the germinating quality of garden seed offered in market, while it will add to the reputation of reliable dealers, tends to drive irresponsible or dishonest men from the business, or into a better course. Among the reports of such tests, is that by the Pennsylvania State College, of experiments performed by Robert Tait, a graduate of the college, in which he gives the percentage of pure seed in the package (or unmixed with other seed), and the percentage capable of germinating. Nearly all the seeds examined were pure, mostly exceeding nine-tenths, but the germinating power was exceedingly various. Some of the common grass seeds were among the best, red clover containing only one part of impurity in 499 parts, and 77 per cent. germinated. Timothy was nearly as pure, with 92 parts germinating. Kentucky blue grass, with about one-fifth impurity, did not afford a twentieth part that germinated, and crested dog's-tail, with scarcely any impurity, gave only one part in 66 capable of growing. It would seem from these and other results that the more common seeds, being readily sold and supplied, are nearly always fresh; while the rarer kinds, for which there is little call by purchasers, are kept long on hand, or more or less mixed with good seed. Another proof of the correctness of this conclusion was the fact that lettuce and raddish seed gave about nine-tenths growing seed, while kohlrabi, which is not much planted, contained more than four-fifths poor seed. But it must not be forgotten that in common, careless planting under clods, or in burying too deep, much excellent seed is pronounced worthless by unskillful farmers and gardeners.—Cultivator.

BITING HORSES.

Horses have been successfully cured of this vice by putting a piece of hard wood, an inch and a half square, in the animal's mouth, about the same length as an ordinary snaffiebit. It may be fastened by a thong of leather passed through two holes in the ends of the wood and secured to the bridle. It must be used in addition to the bit; but in no way to impede the working of the bit. Rarey adopted this plan with the zebra, in the Zoo, which was a terrible brute at biting. Mr. Rarey succeeded, however, in taming and training him to harness and drove him through the streets of London. Animals with this vice should be treated kindly in the stable, and not abused with pitchfork handles, whips, etc. An apple, crust of bread, a piece of beef, etc., and a kind pat, but firm, watchful hand and eye, with the use of the above wooden bit, will cure the most invcterate biter. The fact that he cannot shut his month or grip anything soon dawns upon him, and then he is conquered.—Toronto Globe.

TALK TO YOUR HORSE.

Some men, unknown to the writer hereof, has given to the world a saying that stieks: "Talk to your cow as you would to a lady." There is a world of common sense in it. There is more; there is good, sound religion in it. What else is it but the language of the Bible applied to animals: "A soft answer turneth away wrath." A pleasant word to a horse in time of trouble, has prevented many a disaster where the horse has learned that pleasant words mean a guaranty that danger from punishment is not imminent. One morning a big, musenlar groom said to his employer: "I can't exercise that horse any more. He will bolt and run at anything he sees." The owner, a small man, and ill at the time, asked that the horse be hooked up. Stepping into the skeletou, he drove a couple of miles, and then asked the groom to station along the road such objects as the horse was afraid of. This was done, and the horse was driven by them quickly, back and forth, with loose lines slapping on his back. The whole secret was in a voice that inspired confidence. The man had been frightened at everything he saw that he supposed the horse would fear. The fear went to the horse like an electric message. Then came a punishing pull on the lines, with jerking and the whip. Talk to your horse as you would to your sweetheart. Do not fear but what he understands and appreciates loving tones, if not the words, while it is by no means certain that the sensitive intelligence of many a horse does not comprehend the latter.—Breeders' Gazette.

The Live Stock Record says: "Colic in horses is often brought on by feeding hay passed through cornstalk cutters, mixed with meal, middlings or bran, then wet up. The horse eats his food thus prepared so rapidly that it is not properly masticated, and consequently becomes so clotted in the stomach as to cause indigestion, followed by colic, more especially if directly after eating he is allowed to drink heartily of water; and the colder this is, so much the more it is liable to bring on colic."

The Corn Crop.—The Agricultural Bureau reports the corn crop of 1882 at 1,635,000,000 bushels, and the yield of wheat at 510,000,000 bushels. These estimates may be accepted as probably not far from the amounts which will be shown by the official and final returns, and the results are highly encouraging. Considering the fears which were expressed for the corn crop in the early part of last summer, it appears from the Agricultural Bureau's data to have been exceptionally good. Up to 1879 the maximum yield of Indian corn in this country was 1,547,901,000 bushels. Last year's crop, by the above estimate, exceeds that of 1879 by 87,000,000 bushels, and falls only about 207,000,000 under the crop of 1880. The latest official estimate of that year's wheat crop places it at about 80,000,000 bushels more than that of 1878, 60,000,000 more than that of 1879, and 50,000,000 more than that of 1880. The past year will, therefore, be memorable in the agricultural annals of the country as one of the fruitful seasons, filling not only our own land but others with food and gladness.

A LIFE DOUBLY ASSURED.

A resident of Bangor, Maine, writing to C. N. Crittenton, New York, for a supply of Hale's Honey of Horehound and Tar, mentions incidentally that three months ago a New England life-insurance company refused to grant him a policy on the ground that he was consumptive. "But," he adds, "thanks to the healing properties of that invaluable preparation, my lungs are now perfectly sound, and I yesterday passed a medical examination without an objection, and insured my life for $5,000." "I have examined a package of Royal Baking Powder, purchased by myself in the market. I find it entirely free from alum, terra alba, or any other injurious substance. "Henry Morton, Ph.D., President of Stevens Institute of Technology."

"I have analyzed a package of Royal Baking Powder. The materials of which it is composed are pure and wholesome. "S. Dana Hayes, State Assayer, Mass."

"June 23, 1882.—We have made a careful analytical test of Royal Baking Powder, purchased by ourselves in the open market here, and in the original package. We find it to be a cream of tartar powder of the highest degree of strength, containing nothing but pure, wholesome, and useful ingredients.
"Juan H. Wright, M.D., } Analytical Chemists, St. Louis."
"Albert Merrell, M.D., }

The Royal Baking Powder received the highest award over all competitors at the Vienna World's Exposition, 1873; at the Centennial, Philadelphia, 1876; at the American Institute, and at State Fairs throughout the country.

No other article of human food has ever received such high, emphatic, and universal endorsement from eminent chemists, physicians, scientists, and Boards of Health all over the world.

Note.—The above Diagram illustrates the comparative worth of various Baking Powders, as shown by Chemical Analysis and experiments made by Prof. Schedler. A one pound can of each powder was taken, the total leavening power or volume in each can calculated, the result being as indicated. This practical test for worth by Prof. Schedler only proves what every observant consumer of the Royal Baking Powder knows by practical experience, that, while it costs a few cents per pound more than the ordinary kinds, it is far more economical, and, besides, affords the advantage of better work. A single trial of the Royal Baking Powder will convince any fair minded person of these facts.

* While the diagram shows some of the alum powders to be of a higher degree of strength than other powders ranked below them, it is not to be taken as indicating that they have any value. All alum powders, no matter how high their strength, are to be avoided as dangerous.

The Facts Stated.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his name to the letter, but attaches his affidavit to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

Wallace and a committee, with a view to arrange a reception for Parnell. Dr. Wallace and the committee remained away. The assembled delegates organized a meeting of their own, which was a noisy and angry one. Dr. Wallace was denounced, Parnell's peace policy was repudiated, and dynamite was declared the only policy in the future. In great confusion the meeting adjourned.

—During a high windstorm the Ende House, a three-story brick in Greenville, Texas, was blown down about 2 o'clock Saturday morning. Fire broke out, and nothing could be done toward saving the victims. The lives lost are estimated at fifteen, of whom five were negro servants. The hotel had long been considered unsafe because of its thin walls. Three stores and some small buildings were burned.

—W. E. Walker, residing near Tustin, Mich., was beaten into insensibility by two tramps, Saturday morning, whom he ordered from his barn. They then set fire to the structure and it was consumed, with hay and grain and a number of live-stock.

FOREIGN.

—In a suburb of Birmingham the police discovered a dynamite factory conducted by an Irish-American named Whitehead, who was arrested. A quantity of nitro-glycerine was seized and the apparatus found showed the man to be thoroughly versed in chemistry.

—A powder depot at Passo Correse, Italy, exploded, killing forty persons and wounding several.

—A mine leading to the palace of the Kremlin at Moscow has been discovered. Sappers have been summoned from St. Petersburg to destroy the excavation.

—Michael Davitt writes from prison to the Young Ireland Socicty of Glasgow condemning the dynamite policy as only exasperating the democracy of England, and playing into the hands of Ireland's enemies.

—The German government intends to enforce the statute against American pork, notwithstanding that numerous protests have been received.

—Rioting is progressing on the Panama Canal works between Jamaicans and Cartnagenians, and some twenty of the former have been murdered. The government is powerless to maintain order.

—Fire at Iquique, Peru, on the 10th inst., destroyed ten blocks, including all the churches, the railway offices, and a number of large business establishments. One thousand houses were consumed, and the total loss is placed at $10,000,000.

—A Buddhist procession at Colombo, the capital of Ceylon, recently carried through the streets a cross surmounted by a monkey, which so insensed the Roman Catholic population that a riot resulted, which only vigorous efforts by the troops suppressed

THE BATAVIA CONVENTION MINUTES.

A correspondent writing of the grand addresses in this pamphlet says:

"Let me call particular attention to the address of our noble banner-bearer, the candidate for the suffrages of the nation, under the title "Christian politics." This admirable and timely paper is one which will open blind eyes to the causes of the war and future dangers and ought not to be merely read and shelved. It is like LIVE SEED; Let every reader get and sow it abundantly, and scatter it abroad through every State, and for every year, until victory shall crown our efforts to place a representative of our principles in the Presidential chair of the United States! Print and reprint and circulate in tens of thousands or millions! Our people are intoxicated with national prosperity, and are disregarding "the higher law." In every age the multitude is led more by the senses than by the unseen, but the Ruler of the universe brings to naught things that are by the things that are not! The things that are right and pure are eternal, and in the grand war must finally overcome the cunning and craft of every system like Freemasonry.

DR. JOHN BULL'S

FEVER and AGUE

Or CHILLS and FEVER.

AND ALL MALARIAL DISEASES.

The proprietor of this celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE, CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. He refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to oure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and whole families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the general health. It is, however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is oontinued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medioine will not require any aid to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

The genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN J. SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP, of Louisville, Ky. Examine well the label on each bottle. If my private stamp is not on each bottle do not purchase, or you will be deceived.

NOTES AND COMMENTS.

There are twenty-six companies connected with the Brewers Association of Chicago, either as manufacturers or dealers. They demand $8.00 for each barrel of their brewed swill and impose heavy penalties for any violation of the agreement. These companies represent a capital of between six and seven million dollars and last year produced about 600,000 barrels, though their sales amounted to 900,000. The honest country people who imagine they have no share in the infamy and crime that rises like a vile exhalation from the thousands of beer saloons of Chicago, may do well to remember that 9,000,000 bushels of barley and 2,250,000 pounds of hops, raised and sold by them for money, are consumed in the beer manufacture here.

The American accomplices of the Irish assassins are bold and brave. One of them not long ago addressing an audience yelled out that he "would rather kiss the bloody hands of the murderers of Cavendish and Burke than touch the garments of Bright or Gladstone." If our extradition laws were amended to reach these fellows their valorous roaring would cease and their lions become sucking doves. An illustrated sheet the other day, by means of a spirited sketch, advised Uncle Sam to cast them out of his hotel as tramps.

Governor Butler's Fast-day advice was not well received by the preachers of Massachusetts, since his advice to let politics alone and preach "the Gospel" on that day was a piece of gratuity, and sounded, moreover, like an echo, from lands where church and state have one head. Many of the ministers ignored Butler altogether and did not read his proclamation before their sermons. Butler claims in defense that he only copied from a predecessor who in 1810 gave a similar advice. The Nation says, "We suspect he is greatly mistaken on this point. The Massachusetts ministers were great politicians from the beginning down to 1810 and later, and one result of their political activity was the absence of Butler. His growth would have been impossible when they were in their heyday, or, if he had appeared, he certainly would have caught it in a way of which the sermons of last Fast day give but little idea. The Massachusetts ministers, as any one knows who has perused any of their sermons about Jefferson, the Democrats, or the French Revolution, were not mealy-mouthed in old times in talking about such a son of Belial as Butler would have seemed to them to be at any period, and as he undoubtedly is. Nobody, in any age, who looks at him from an ecclesiastical point of view, and feels bound to characterize him, can avoid using language of great strength."

The dynamite discoveries in England presented a case of danger so near at hand that with the exception of one Tory gentleman in the House of Lords all parties in Parliament united in pressing through a bill against the unlawful meddling with explosives. A two year's imprisonment was the only punishment for this offense. This was intended only to prevent accidents, and when Sir Vernon Harcourt from the ministry said, "We have to deal with an organized plan against all the interests of society, and with men who announce plans for murder," and presented a bill with a penalty of life imprisonment for causing a perilous explosion; twenty years for making, using or keeping explosives, and fourteen years for suspicious connection with the business, he met a unanimous response. The bill was presented Monday afternoon last week; both Houses passed upon it and the Queen's assent was given by telegram so that before Tuesday night it was law. The Irish members, though not opposing did not vote for the bill. Too many of their countrymen, who would not join the dynamite conspiracy, yet look on with a savage joy to see England well scared by the blowing out of an office front at Westminster and the discovery of a factory for explosives at Birmingham. How this can favorably affect their case and aid in bringing about Home Rule for Ireland must require a curious logic to convince any one even ordinarily well-informed in English history.

The first of the Phœnix Park murderers has been sentenced to death amid his continued and apparently sincere protestations of innocence. The fate of the other six men on trial will soon be known, although it is believed that two of them will not be condemned to death but to life imprisonment. This will end the third act in this tragedy of secretism. A point in the testimony which is drawing some comment is that the members of this desperate band received the sacrament regularly at the hands of the priest after confession. Thus fortified with the authority of their religion, and believing in an absolution from the penalty of their crimes before the court of heaven, they entered upon their awful work with a deliberation that few can understand who have not studied the nature of a false religion. The sympathy of the Dublin crowd is always given to the prisoners. Carey and the other informers are hissed, while Brady is cheered with such energy that the police have to use authority to keep the peace. The foreman of the jury, also, had a demand for a verdict of not guilty, coupled with a threat of certain death if he refused. The value of such documents is much below par since the government has broken into the secret ring of these men.

Preparations for the coronation of the Czar proceed while the threatening demonstrations of the Nihilists increase, and the arrests of suspected persons are already beyond the capacity of the jails. But daily announcements are made of new pageants, and the Czar and his wife ride freely and without escort through the streets of St. Petersburg. Whether they are confident that their secret enemies will be held in check by the police, or they are enjoying the brief and desperate interval before the coronation ceremony with a resolution to meet whatever fate may overtake them with royal fortitude, no one dares to guess. Only it appears that the Nihilist "fraternity" is more desperate than ever, their determination more unconquerable and their regard for consequences more fierce and reckless. The Irish lodge assassins are made so much of in the papers that they may be excused if they do not play a Samson's part in some of their enterprises, but in Russia we may look for just such characters, who will not hesitate to sacrifice their own lives in the general destruction of their enemies.

If argument cannot prove to working men the folly of secret lodges to protect their interests, nor continued losses and privation in strikes, perhaps the open war which frequently begins upon men not under the lodge oath may help to suppress the evil. The rolling-mill hands at Springfield, the capital of this State, having left work on a strike, non-union men have taken their places. In revenge the latter have been beset, beaten, and several have been murdered. The last attack was by firing from ambush, when three men fell dead or wounded. There is much in this case that likens it to some of the boycotting and shooting from hedges in Ireland, but the Springfield murderers themselves would hardly dare say that their cause for revenge was at all to be compared with the Irish Fenian. In the same proportion should their punishment be as severe; but here the contrast ends, for our courts have seldom adequately punished outrages of this kind. But if the workingmen themselves could be aroused to see the danger and temptation of these secret unions they would banish them as a weapon more dangerous to the laborer than against his supposed enemy and oppressor, the capitalist.

From statistics recently published we learn that the number of Masons in the United States is 566,149. We also learn that the net loss in membership during the past year was nearly 1,000, and during the past two years over 7,000.

HOLES IN THE WALL.

BY ELDER NATHAN CALLENDER.

Arsenic is not more poison to rats, than is light to lodgery. To say nothing of moral light, secretism cannot endure daylight. Strange medley of intense contradictions and absurdities! Ever traveling east in search of light, and worshiping the sun himself while daylight is doubly shut out by carefully curtained windows, above the level of human vision, and that at "low twelve." No wonder if spiritual light is ten-fold repugnant to these lodge beetles. Light is a formidable subject to fight. It "maketh manifest."

By the finger of Omnipotence, Ezekiel was summoned to Jerusalem, from Babylon, and cited to a "hole in the wall." While Masonry claims surpassing holiness it may be conceded that its walls are very hole-y, and daily becoming more so. It may demand of the Son of man to "dig" to lay open the door, and enter the chambers of idolatry, but the clergy who are not too lazy to dig and are ashamed to beg at the lodge doors for light (after paying for it) will find the "good men" of the Sanhedrim, priests and elders of Israel, in shameful business. All Babylon could not have harmed Zion so much as these good (?) men of Jerusalem did, right in the "holy place" in the Temple of God. The Masonic clergy are doing infinitely more to-day to retard the cause of God than all the open-faced infidels in the world. None had it in his power to betray Jesus but his avowed friends, and none but Judas Iscariot was vile enough to do that deed. Let the reader turn to Ezekiel 8th chapter and carefully read and be cured of the "good man" argument. Like the minions of the lodge to-day, all the good men of Jerusalem were devoutly "worshiping the sun toward the east."

With all the care the lodge has given to "secrecy and silence," many a rude hole is found in the Masonic walls which tells where the door is through which the craft enter into the midnight orgies of which Paul said it is shame even to speak. For with these things he commanded the saints to have no fellowship, but rather to reprove them. With all its hellish cunning, the "Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite" book of Masonry has punched the Masonic walls full of holes, where the true prophet of God like Ezekiel, may find the doors into the false worships and arrogant assumptions of the craft. This book is full of interest to the studious and fearless observer of the signs of these times. In it we find twenty-one pages devoted to the ceremonies of "Infant Baptism."

The "profane" may get a squint at the purposes and hopes of this modest "handmaid" of religion by the following words found on page 575, closing verse:

"Onward! there are ills to conquer
Ere our peaceful flag he furled;
Masonry at last shall conquer,
And its altar be the world."

When this prophecy is fulfilled there will be but one religious altar and that will be the altar of Masonry. Yet in the face of this and scores of similar assumptions, the author says on page 558: "Masonry is no religion nor does it assume to take the place of any religion!" It arrogates to itself to do for man all that man is susceptible of receiving even at the hands of omnipotent Wisdom and Love, yet is no religion and seeks to take the place of none! Is all religion then, to be eradicated by an altar which represents no religion? And are we to have a religionless world, filled so full of lodgery that no religion can subsist in the world? Well, the signs of these times do seem to point in that direction.

When one half, perhaps, of the Christian clergy is represented at that altar and a very large part of the other half are so lodge-bound that no word of warning or rebuke can be wrung from their sealed lips, it may seem to some that the Masonic altar may soon "be the world." But when the "enemy comes in like a flood the Spirit of the Lord shall lift up a standard against him." The great battle of "Armegeddon" is pending. Our secret foe is invisible to the masses even of the church. A far-seeing general will always strive to divert his enemy from the main point of conflict. It is now believed that the grand enemy to be met is "Prince Alcohol," while he is only the enemy's picket line, crouching in front of the lodge. If he can make the church, the clergy, and the press believe that he is the main force, and so divert them in that direction, then he will aid the lodge in the final contest. But shrewd as are the minions of the lodge empire, scores of holes are apparent to every candid man and woman in our land, through which the ever industrious light is flashing its unwelcome beams into the very face of the thousands of sun worshipers in the churches of their imagery. These unavoidable holes are soon dug into doors by the God-directed Ezekiels of the day. Masonry must have its written as well as its oral teaching. Their standard books, given to the world, furnish such a perfect line of corroborative evidence, taken along with the revelations of the system by seceders, as to amount to absolute demonstration. Ten thousand witnesses speak in the most perfect accord and throw a light equal to the electrical glare upon the raging waters of the great Niagara. Masonry is now a secret society only in purpose and design, not in fact. As soon the blind mole blow out the sun as the lodge shut off the light flashing through ten thousand holes made by Masons themselves. If the institution can subsist in the light with its character known to the people, it will argue the condition of society irredeemable and abandoned of God.

In assuming that light will cure evil we must restrict the proposition by the facts of history. The light shone in darkness and the darkness received it not. Jesus said, "This is the condemnation that light is come into the world and men loved darkness rather than light because their deeds were evil." The minions of the lodge may yet band together, as did the infuriated enemies of the "Light of the world," and make war on the faithful, while they openly practice their Baal worship, without shame, in the face of truth and righteousness. Be this as it may, light is the only cure, and must be administered unceasingly and without stint, till the false worship of the lodge becomes odious to all the good of the church and in our world. Till the sons of the lodge can go in and out without making holes in the walls, or manage to pull the hole in after them, some Ezekiel will track them to their "chambers of imagery" and tell the world of their deeds. Despite the "good man" plea, God will ferret them out even if he has to take the best of his servants by the hair of their heads and put them on the track of these good (?) men in the church and ministry. Let us fancy that the prophet said to his Lord, Lord I don't know anything about these abominations down there in the Temple at Jerusalem and I don't want to know. I have all I can attend to here in Babylon to comfort the captives. And then, Lord, thou knowest that it is none of my business to inquire what societies the Jerusalemites are connected with. Just then I fancy that a Daniel suggests to the discreet prophet that somebody is in duty bound to speak out against these abominations practiced in the very sanctuary, in the holy of holies; practiced too by the ancients and elders of Israel. Ezekiel says in reply, When God tells me to do it I shall do it. God did tell him to do it and he did it promptly. Shall a time-serving clergy and church drive the Lord far off from his sanctuary? And shall the scene of Ezekiel, 9th chapter, be repeated as the consequence?

TRUTH AND TRICK.

BY ALEXANDER THOMSON.

One evening when the days were fine,
When spring's cold rains and gusts were over
When June had greened the mountain pine,
And oped the red heart of the clover.
When by the lakelet's rippling rim,
The plover wheeled in swift gyrations,
And sweet doves cooed their vernal hymn,
On flowery hanks and fair plantations,

There met heside a silvery brook,
By alders frilled, and deeply shaded,
Two stalwart youths, whose mein and look,
No artificial splendors aided.
Each soul was in a thoughtful mood,
Their eyes, the future years were scanning,
And each descried from where he stood,
The distant object of his planning.

One thus: "You know they call me Truth,
My future path is straight and narrow,
O'er hills and mountain tops forsooth,
My way is onward like an arrow.
Not mine to play the Reynard's part,
And hide my track hy many a douhle,
I'll let the daylight search my heart,
Nor from the moonlight hide my trouhle.

"Not mine to climh hy false prctense,
And win the world's renown unfairly,
My motto shall he truth and sense,
And means, my lahor late and early.
I see no power or sunken gold,
Along the path that I must travel,
The ridgy hills are hare and hold,
And sharp, and rough, and deep the gravel.

"Yet bright my final future shines,
As any picture drawn hy Bonheur,
God's angels stand along its lines,
And Graces are my guards of honor."

The other thus: "They call me Trick,
Not mine to climh and toil and suffer;
If Fortune shall not hless me quick,
I'll roughly shake the jade and cuff 'er.
Not mine to walk the narrow way,
If I can find a hetter treading,
Not mine the soher truth to say,
If falsehood makes a hetter heading.

"Be mine to hide the main intent,
In wily subterfuge's lining,
Then in the garment make a rent,
When in my reach the prize is shining;
Be mine by suhtle wiles to win,
What others gain hy patient plodding,
I'll take the gold and risk the sin
And huy my pardon with my loading.

"My pathway threads the pleasant hills
And down along the smiling river,
I hate your mountains and their chills,
Your onward, upward march forever;
I'll take the path I like the hest,
I'll freely risk its final ending;
Fools huild their homes on honor's crest,
Where wild winds howl in rude contending;

"I'll huild mine in the vale of craft,
And from its hidden windows smiling,
See Truth upon his crazy raft,
Among the angry waters toiling;
Shall see him climb the ridgy steep,
And tread with naked feet the gravel,
And laugh to see him grimly keep,
A path that is so hard to travel."

BAPTIZED INTO WHAT NAME?

In the times of the Jewish dispensation there were various names or appellations of Deity, as we observe in the Old Testament Scriptures. These were given by high authority, and without such divine authority individuals had no right to multiply for themselves other names. So far then, as the Jew experienced baptismal regeneration—spiritual or otherwise, it was effected in the name and by the power of Elohim, Jehovah Elohenu, etc. He remained justified, so far as he fulfilled, with fidelity and uprightness of heart, the typical law of Moses, the servant of God. He was held a debtor to do the whole law, and if his faith is yet right wherefore stands he released from his obligation? Even if he yet clings to circumcision there is much of the law and the ceremony he has cast aside, and by what authority? No doubt he stands ready with an answer, but is that answer valid?

The apostles received command in the succeeding dispensation to proselyte or baptize, one or both, into divine names, differing somewhat, yet in reality the same deity. The deity of the Jews was the true God and Creator, but how was he reconciled to fallen and polluted man but by the propitiatory sacrifice and mediation of him that was typified in the law and was yet to be openly revealed in the man Christ Jesus? The Jew, therefore, wilfully rejecting Christ the Mediator, has no reconciliation with the Father offended until he repent and is made willing to enter in by the door into the fold.

What of the Mahommedan? He has faith in Allah or as the name is in Arabic, perhaps, Allahon; and admitting this to signify nearly the same as the Hebrew Elohim, how is he reconciled? Christ, the true Mediator, is left out and a deceiver, the lying prophet, is let in. By what authority, therefore, is his system of worship set up? What may we say, in brief, of the Buddhist, the Brahmin, the Greek, the Roman, the idolatrous of all times and nations? What if Jupiter, or Jove, is made to signify Creator, Grand Architect, etc. Where is the reconciliation? The stone these builders have rejected must crush these false systems in the end. The Roman Catholic acknowledges all the Gospel names of deity and is apparently zealous for the honor and renown of the true Godhead. What then is his deficiency? He places the pope and priesthood in a false relation and the deceptive rites and ceremonies mislead the worshipers. A deceiver in so great a matter as divine worship, whether Catholic or other, is a great abomination, and it "were better that a mill stone were tied about his neck." Into what name do the evangelical clergy, or priesthood, if you please, baptize? With one voice they exclaim, "Father, Son and Holy Ghost." So far as they proselyte it must be into the Gospel name and out of the heathen.

What of Masonry, Odd-fellowship, etc., as religious systems? If "The Grand Architect of the Universe" signifies so much as Elohim, yet where is the reconciliation? Masonic works, rules or regulations? By none of these is the sinner justified. They reject Christ. Their entire system is heathenish, not Christlike—in the highest degree abominable, dark, made hidden or so attempted because of evil deeds. Scripture testimony is not stronger against any abomination through which men are damned than it is against the dark and villainous principle of Masonry. Wherefore then have preachers been seduced? Many have perhaps not examined it properly. Many find it, or think they do, a worldly advantage, and cling to it at all hazards. Many of these were baptized "in the name of the Father, Son," etc., but it was a ceremony. They still need the Holy Ghost and fire baptism abundantly, more than did John when he so acknowledged it to Christ the Saviour. Baptized into Masonry! Submit to cable-tow and hoodwink! Kneel to mock prayer and an accursed altar! Enter a fraternity of the condemned! Seal your lips to all evil! Follow Satan into all this temptation and much more and reap a little worldly advantage! They hereby prove that the trinity into which they are spiritually baptized is "the world, the flesh, and the devil." O for more of the baptism that would take wrong out of the soul, or the soul out of wrong.

NEWS FROM THE COMET.

Ours is a universe of wonders Masonic! We must explain some things. Masonry proceeds by contraries and these bring equilibrium. So teaches sublime science. When we mention light we do not mean that of the sun's rays, but such as comes to our craft through dark walls in the "secret chamber," through a closely fitted hoodwink; and spiritual light must come through a soul, hood-winked by concentrated, double pressure, Masonic covenants and oaths, multiplied and intensified, beaten into the cranium by a setting maul, till the candidate can see stars where no stars are. Then again the great, good and grand secret, the "center of truth" are ever ahead, and must ever be there—or, nowhere, which is the sure alternative. In this sublime Masonic sense, then, we hurry on to behold the G. L. A. A million leagues a day brings us nearer and nearer.

Only think! A very few more days will bring us within the bounds of that supreme realm, where the "thrice potent," "all puissant," "Grand Pontiff" presides. To Masons he is the "Ancient of days." References to him may be found in an ancient book which we put under the compass and square. We do not relish the character this book gives our "worshipful master." It calls him hard names, because he was too independent and high-toned to bow to one Shaddai, when he was brought into court, he, with many more, "left his own habitation" and is therefore, "reserved in everlasting chains under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day." He is now recognized by the hoodwink, emblem of darkness, and the chain, or cable-tow, which he wears of "his own free will and accord" as do all the sublime brethren. There he sits—"Lucifer, son of the morning," Grand Inspector General of universal Baal worship.

Some of the names given our Grand Master, in that old book, sometimes recognized as the "book of the law," sound odious to some, but they are only descriptive of the contraries which help make up the harmonies and accords of our diversified universe. With this explanation take the titles of our sublime prince "Apollyon," the "Old Serpent," "liar," "murderer," etc., as compliments indicative of his notoriety and eminence. As he is the most conspicuous figure in the G. L. A. we must scan his person. Behold the deep fiery eyes! Does not that fierce look mean business? Disappointed purpose, wounded pride, fathomless depths of intensified hatred, glancing upward toward the obnoxious throne of the "King of Glory." Millions of pages could not express the smallest fraction of that awfully proud and defiant look. But somehow we cannot throw off the conviction that, with all his pomp and pride, he is a sublime wreck. Still he is sole monarch of his realm —yet subject to a higher law. Ah! this is his torture. He glances upward frowning!

Were not "judgment and justice the habitation of his throne" that frown would surely shake it to its very center. But while it trembled not the "King Eternal" sat unmoved and serene. Grand Master Lucifer lacks one degree of getting up to the supreme place, between which and himself there is infinity. Our sublime craft cannot confer that degree—though the fact is to be kept a profound secret among Masons. We ought to pretend to reinstate the devil, and swear to it, or we might violate our Masonic covenant and so become perjured villains, and so commit the unpardonable sin.

So much of our time has been given to our Grand Commander that we must defer further news. We have a "stop over ticket" and intend to stay in this G. L. over night. Some of the "thrice potents" will next come to the front. ORION.

A RECREANT CLERGY.

If the history of the United States during the last thirty years were to be written from a moral stand point, as the history of the Israelites was written, which is the only instructive history of the world, our clergy would appear in anything but a favorable light. No relapse from the worship of the true God to the serving of Baal would appear worse than the course which clergymen have followed here in the United States in modern times.

Let us go back a little. From about the year 1851 it must have become evident to the country that the slave-power, aided by the Masonic organization, was marshaling its forces in order to attack the Republic. What, therefore, was the duty of the clergy under these circumstances? It was evidently to warn the people to trust in God and their Constitution, and not to follow off their politicians into the Baal-worship of the lodge. It was a fearful thing to turn the back upon the God of the fathers, and upon the Constitution in such a momentous crisis, and put trust in the aprons, the compasses, the gavel, the all-seeing eye, the false deities of the lodge, and in the Royal Arch constitution. It was a wicked manifestation of distrust in our religion and our political institutions. It was forsaking the church of Christ, under which we had been trained and placing our confidence in the lodge which was worshiped by the slave-power, and which is treason against Christ.

The duty of the clergy on such a momentous occasion was, first, to warn the people against this impiety, and second, to utterly abstain from it themselves. The clergy ought to be a great conservative body for maintaining the purity of our Christian republican institutions, set apart and paid (though badly paid they are) by the people for this purpose; and they have no possible right or excuse for worshiping at other altars than those of the early settlers of New England and Virginia, whose God had brought them out from the false worships of Europe.

But our clergy have proved recreant to their duty in the great hour of the nation's trial, and have not only gone into the lodge in large numbers, but they vote for politicians who sustain the worship of the lodge. Thousands of them stand in a worse relation to our American institutions than those priests whom the prophet Elijah contended with stood in towards the institutions of Moses.

What is the remedy? Where the people are at the head of religion and the state there can be but one answer to this question, and that is, the people must cease to employ such recreant clergymen. Turn them out of the church and let them free the land, by muscular toil, from some of the brambles and thorns which they have helped to bring upon it. But what if the clergy still go into the lodge to worship the fetiches there, and the people love to have it so? What then?

There appears to us but one answer to this question, which is, that under such circumstances our present religion and form of government must cease to exist. If the people ostensibly honor Christ openly and yet worship his inimical rival, the lodge, in secret; if the people sustain an irresponsible secret party, namely, the lodge, and vote for an open party right the reverse of this secret one; if the measure of popular virtue is that of the Masonic lodge; if clergymen who belong to it are sustained by popular approval, then society is thrown into a state of moral chaos, in which nothing noble, nothing heroic, nothing of a republican standard of excellence can survive.

Our free institutions, which are threatening to become licentious institutions, give almost every man the right to vote, criminals in prison hardly excluded; but still we are all subject to the moral law that prohibits us from following any party, however multitudinous, to do wickedly. As true men we have no moral right to sustain a clergy, or a political party, that sustains, or is sustained by the interests of the Masonic lodge. AMERICAN.

THE BLACK HAND.

The revelations which the Spanish courts and police are making about the operations of the secret society called the Black Hand, in Andalusia, show that it far surpasses, in power and extent, anything which the anarchial movement has produced either in France or Russia or Ireland. The province appears to have been honeycombed with secret societies acting under a central head, and executing its orders with blind obedience. These orders involved every variety of crime, such as murder, assault, house-burning, the destruction of vineyards, and the mutilation of cattle. Obnoxious persons, such as landlords, bailiffs, shopkeepers, tavernkeepers, or others suspected of giving information to the police, were tried at the monthly meetings of the League, and, if condemned, the task of murdering them or burning their houses was formally committed, as in Ireland, to a committee of the initiated. Nor does the membership appear to have been confined to one class of society. The 360 prisoners who were recently brought into Xeres by the police were not only of all ages, but included small landholders as well as simple peasants, and smugglers, and escaped or discharged criminals. The sending of threatening letters to landlords and employers, as well as to judges and police officers, appears to have been, as in Ireland, a part of the regular business of the malcontents.

Opinions vary as to whether the Black Hand has any connection with the International or other foreign Anarchists. There are Socialist organizations among the workingmen in many of the large towns in Spain, but there does not appear to be any good reason for believing that either they or the foreign societies have done much to propogate their ideas among the peasantry. Some of their documents have been found in the hands of members of the Black Hand, and some of the prisoners talk Collectivism, and Anarchism, and Nihilism, but apparently without having got hold of the true inwardness of these movements. The better opinion is that the Black Hand is a purely agrarian and purely Andalusian movement, without any inspiration from the outside. The Andalusians are very ignorant and superstitious, and very suspicious of everything foreign, and therefore very unlikely to offer a good field to agents of the International, although, of course, the chiefs of the International are eager enough to claim the operations of the Black Hand as a fresh illustration of their power, just as O'Donovan Rosso likes to claim all the Irish outrages as his doing. —The Nation.

SHORT SERMON.

TEXT:—If thy right hand offend thee, cut it off.

MY BRETHREN: Suppose your Lord had said to you—If thy daily paper offend thee, cut it off; what would you do? Would you cease to subscribe for it?

My friends, a daily paper that honors Freemasonry by publishing its solemn stupidities, and never ventures upon a depracatory comment against its unmanly tricks, ought to give your Christian feelings great offense. If we take no offense from such a cause, may we not well suspect ourselves of being too callous to be offended at any indignity that is ever offered to a crucified Saviour? Think of a newspaper in a Christian country honoring a conspiracy against the honor of Chsist!

My friends, to pay your money for the support of such a paper is worse than it would have been for a party of pious Pharisees to hire a band of mockers to exhibit their triumphant enmity at the crucifixion.

My Christian friends, did you ever read our text to your children and then tell them, It is for this cause that, though I sorely feel the need of a daily paper, I have cut it off? The support which the paper gives to Freemasonry offends my sense of right, which I think it best not to stifle for the sake of my moral health, as instructed by my Lord.

The Masonic lodge is of infinitely less value to you or to the country than your right hand, or your right eye. Its power to steal or murder, or throw a look of malignity and hate, is infinitely greater than that of the hand or eye. It is an offense against reason, against equity, against charity, and, worse than all, against our Redeemer, whom it dishonors by enviously doing good in another name than in his own. To give a cup of cold water in the name of the Masonic lodge, which is but a coiled serpent of deceit and poison, instead of in the name of the Saviour of mankind, is the greatest offense that the pretended Christian could commit. It is an obdurate, indecent mockery of the dreadful price which was paid for our redemption from just such wickedness.

But, my friends, remember that you must pluck out your eye, too, if it offends you. Not only must your daily paper be cut off, but you must cut off your favorite preacher, and your favorite candidate for the Presidency, if he secretly supports the idolatrous worship of the lodge.

My brethren, the lodge is entirely a work of men's hands, as much so as if it were made of wood or stone. To worship it, or do good in its name, is to eat meat offered to idols, which the first Christian church at Jerusalem prohibited us Western converts from gentilism from doing. Have we not grown in grace since then? If I ever eat meat again, I will eat none of the vile stuff offered by the lodge; and I will cut off the daily paper that is afraid to condemn it, and the preacher who serves it. SO MOTE IT BE!

EASTER SUPERSTITIONS.

Last Sabbath (March 25th) was, as is generally supposed, the anniversary of the resurrection of Christ, and is by the prevalence of Catholic usage commonly called Easter, a word improperly employed in the translation of Acts 12: 4, instead of "Passover." Easter was a Pagan festival in honor of the goddess Ostara, or Eastre, celebrated near the same time of the year as the Jewish Passover, because among her worshipers she was recognized as the goddess of the Spring and of the morning. This worship prevailed among the northern Germans and was introduced into England by the Saxons. The Catholic policy of mingling Jewish, Pagan and Christian rites together in the church converted the Jewish passover and the heathen Ostara festival into a so-called Christian festival, or holy day. In the beginning of the 16th century being called the "Sunday of joy," it had become a day for caronsal. The people celebrated it by dances and farcical exhibitions. Coming after the austere season of Lent, they gave themselves up to extremes of indulgence. The clergy joined in these, reciting on that day from their pulpits stories and legends that excited mirth and laughter, until the ceremonies, ceasing to possess the character of Christian solemnities, became indecent. The reformers of the 16th century succeeded in changing the character somewhat of the Easter festival, and the Presbyterians afterward, under the leadership of Calvin and Knox, banished it from the observances of the church. It is characteristic of the tendencies of our times that even the Presbyterians are rapidly falling back to the custom of observing it. Indeed in the large cities it seems to have become a general festival by common consent. In this city Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists, Lutherans, and very many of the Presbyterian churches distingnish the day by decorations, special musical services, baptisms, communions, etc., much in the same manner as they are falling into the custom of observing Christmas and harmonizing with the Roman church in the recognition of the day, if not in the manner of its observance.

There is no authority in the Scripture for the observance of such days, and the special ceremonies connected with them. There is not a hint of a festival like Christmas or Easter in the New Testament and the establishment of such days and their peculiar ceremonies is the result simply of the optional or permissive theory of worship. Let it once prevail and we know not whither we will drift; we have no place for a limit short of the Catholic ritual. We think an impartial observer would be astonished at the rapidity of the drift. We are reminded of the suddenness with which the Galatians, "having begun in the spirit," sought to be "made perfect in the flesh."

The introdnction of these nnauthorized and showy institutions into the worship of the church is an unmistakable evidence of the decline of her spiritual life.—Christian Instructor.

RUSSIAN REFORM.

One hears so much of Nihilism in connection with the Russian government that little account is taken of the vital reforms which the Czar is really trying to bring about. When serfdom was abolished the land was given to the freedman under a government mortgage. They were charged six per cent. interest, and were expected to free their holdings within a certain number of years. The intense hatred of the Jews by the Russian peasants is attributable in great part to the fact that so many Hebrews are among those who have profited by the misery of the Russian laborers. The three great reforms of the Czar are, first, the surrendering of the money payment of the government for the use of the land. This went into effect the beginning of the present year; but, of course, it will take time for the good results of this measure to be experienced. The next reform is one in which equal difficulty will be experienced in carrying out. To save the people from the usurers the government is about to organize banks to loan money to agriculturists at the lowest possible interest. It is this well-intended measure which has closed the money markets of Europe against Russia. In all human probability Alexander will fail in carrying on this well-meant measure. The third of his reforms is the rescinding of the poll tax, which pressed heavily upon the poor. In its place he substituted a graduated income tax, rising from five per cent. on the lowest taxable incomes to fifty per cent. on the highest; the object of the autocrat being to discourage accumulations of wealth in a few hands, and distribute it among the poorer population. The greatest Communist of the day is the Czar of all the Russias. This is why the Nihilists have the warm sympathies of the nobles and very wealthy.—Demorest's Monthly.

AMONG THE ZUNIS.

LODGE RITES AND INCANTATIONS AMONG THE INDIANS OF NEW MEXICO.

The contributions of Mr. Frank H. Cushing of the Smithsonian Institute, Washington, to the Century magazine, respecting the character and religious and social customs of the tribe of Zuni Indians, have been of special interest to many because of the marked resemblances in their religious formalities to the rites of the Masonic lodge. More than a year since when a delegation of the tribe was visiting Washington and our northern cities, attention was called in these pages to this matter. But Mr. Cushing writes at some length in the February number of the magazine describing ceremonies evidently connected with sun worship, and which he is himself constraiued to mark as resembling Freemasonry in many particulars. The following extract will be read with interest:

The messenger guided me to the low door, which I entered, breathing audibly on my hand. Stepping into the brightly lighted center of the room, I started off very well with, "My fathers" (Hom a ta-tchu), but here broke down, and placing the candles and tobacco on the floor, with a muttered apology, I unfortunately finished, partly in Spanish. Instantly two or three of the sprawling priests started up exclaiming, "Shu! shu!" and stretched their hands excitedly toward me. One of them took a wand from the front of the altar, and gravely advanced toward me. Without a word I stretched out my hand, and he hit me a terrific blow directly across the wrist. Never wincing, however, although the pain was excruciating, I stretched out the other hand and my two feet in succession, receiving the hard blows on each. I breathed on my hand and said, E-lah-kwa (thanks!). The priest spat on the wand, smiled, and waved it four or five times around my head. The white-haired father of the ten then approached me, placed his finger on his lips as a warning, thanked me for the presents, and asked that the "light of the gods might shine on my path of life." But he directed that I be hustled away, for fear I might commit some other indiscretion.

I had gained my object, however, in merely entering the room. It was large. At the western end stood an altar, composed of tablets of various heights and widths, strangely carved and painted in representation of gods, and set up in the form of a square. At the back were larger tablets, on and through which figures of the sun, moon, and stars were painted and cut. Within the square stood a number of sacred wands of long macaw feathers inserted into beautiful wicker-work handles. Overhead hung the figure of a winged god, a little in front of and below which was suspended horizontally an elaborate cross. It was composed of two tablets, carved to zigzag points at the ends, and joined at the center, so as to resemble a wind-mill with four arms. Numerous eagle-plumes depended from the lower edges of the four arms, on each of which was perched the effigy of a swallow.* Underneath this stood a large medicine-bowl with terraced edges. It was covered with figures of frogs, tadpoles, and dragon-flies, and contained a clear, yellowish fluid. Over this two of the priests were crouching and muttering incantations. Behind the altar, partly covered with little, embroidered cotton kilts, were the warty masks and the neck-cloths of these priestly clowns. Almost immediatcly on entering, my guide had uttered prayers and scattered medicine flour over them. All along the walls of the great room, now vivid in the fire-light, now indistinct in the flickering shadows, were painted in red, green, blue and yellow, the figures of animals, birds, human monsters, demons and significant pictographs.

This little glimpse revealed to me a mysterious life by which I had little dreamed I was surrounded, and I looked forward with curious anxiety to the coming ceremonials.

That night on my way home, I saw great fires blazing on the south-western hills. I could hear the sound of rattles, and the long, wierd cries of the dancers, whose forms were too distant to be seen even against the snow-sprinkled slopes. "The Long-horn and the Hooter, the wand-bearers and the sacred guardians, whom you shall see four days hence," said my brother, as he opened the door to let me in, and motioned with his head in the direction of the sounds.

During the next day, hundreds of Navajos, Moquis, and Indians from the Rio Grande pueblos, gathered in from the surrounding country. Everybody was busy. Oxen were slaughtered by the dozen, sheep by the hundred. In every household some of the men could be seen sewing garments both for themselves and the women. The latter were busily engaged in grinding corn, cooking paper-bread over great polished, black stones, cutting up meat, bringing water, and weaving new blankets and belts. Outside, continual streams of burros, heavily laden with wood, came pouring in from the surrounding mesas.

My old brother, however, was none too busy to insist constantly that I should not sketch the "fearful Sha-la-k'o," when they came in from the west. If I would promise this, the party and I should be permitted to see the great ceremonial, which never before had the white man been allowed to look upon.

Toward evening, on the second day following, people began to gather all over the southern terraces, and away out over the plain there appeared seven gigantic, black-headed, white forms, towering high above their crowd of attendants. Gradually they came toward the pueblo, stopping, however, midway in the plain across the river, to perform some curious ceremonials. Meanwhile, eight remarkably costumed figures preceded them, crossed the river, and passed along the western end of the pueblo. These were the same the Governor had told me of. The "Long-horn" and the "Hooter" were clothed in embroidered white garments, and their faces were covered by horrible, ghastly, white masks, with square, black eye and mouth-holes. Their head-dresses were distinguished from each other only by the large white appendages, like bat-ears, attached to one of them, while the other was furnished with a long, green horn, from which depended a fringe of wavy black hair, tufts of which covered the heads of both. The bore in their right hands clattering rattles made from the shoulder-blades of deer, and in their left, painted plumed sticks. Following came two red-bodied, elaborately costumed and ornamented characters wearing round, green helmets, across the tops of which were attached painted round sticks with shell-rattles at either end. They bore in their hands white deer-horns and plumed sticks, and were, with the others, guarded by two nearly nude figures with round-topped, long-snouted, red masks, surrounded at the neck by collars of crow-feathers. They carried rattles like those of the chief figures, and long yucca wands with which to chastise spactators who might approach too near.

All of these were preceded by a gorgeously costumed, bare-headed priest, with streaks of black, shining paint across his eyes and chin, and profusely decorated with turquois ear-rings and shell necklaces. A snow-white deer-skin mantle was thrown gracefully over his shoulders and trailed in the dust behind. He carried a tray of sacred plumes in his hand, and was closely followed by a representation of the fire-god. This was an entirely nude boy, the body painted black and covered all over with many-colored round spots. His face and head were entirely concealed by a round-topped, equally black and speckled mask or helmet. Slung across his shoulder was a pouch made from the skin of a fawn, and in his hand a long, large, smoking torch of cedar bark, which he kept gracefully waving from side to side.

The whole party passed rapidly toward one of the plazas, where a square hole had been dug by the Priest of the Sun. After dancing back and forth four times to the clang of their rattles, uttering at intervals cries of hoo too! hoo too! the four principal characters, with long prayers and ceremonials,* deposited sacrificed of some of the plumed sticks. This ceremonial was repeated in the chief plaza of the pueblo, and outside of it north, south, and east, after which the whole party, just at sunset, retired into one of the immense sacred rooms at the southern side of the town.

THE GREAT DEBATE AT MORNING SUN, IOWA.

Contrary to the expectations of many friends, who have observed how careful are the lodge leaders in preventing any public discussion of the principles of Freemasonry, the debate arranged for Elder Rathbun, Iowa State lecturer, and Rev. F. W. Evans, of the Methodist Episcopal church, Oskaloosa, actually took place last week, occupying the afternoon and evening of four days, from Tuesday till Friday. This is, as we now remember, the first time a lodge champion has been found who would stand to his arrangement and defend the principles, secrets, oaths and ritual of Freemasonry in a prolonged public discussion. Full arrangements have more than once been made heretofore, but the wiser members of the lodge have broken them up at the last moment. They know too well that the system of Freemasonry is indefensible before candid and honorable men, and therefore are careful to maintain most strictly the landmark that forbids the discussion of Freemasonry in the presence of outsiders.

Mr. Evans, however, is known as a skillful debater. He boasts of often meeting the champions of infidelity and sectarianism. Perhaps over-confidence in his ability led the lodge to withhold the usual objections. He appeared promptly, and carried out his part with fairness and ability. The hall was crowded every evening, and well filled all the time; the Masons also, when it is considered that there is no lodge in Morning Sun, were out in good number. So large was the attendance that it was estimated that the small admittance fee of five cents each meeting, or 25 cents for the whole debate, would pay the hall rent and put $40 in the pocket of each debater. The announcement of the debate had attracted wide attention, and many from abroad would have gladly attended. The presence of the Iowa Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian church, whose annual meeting fell providentially at the same time, was a great encouragement. Bro. M. N. Butler, of the Albany Freeman, Missouri State lecturer, was also present, and by request of Elder Rathbun, whose eyes are weak, was permitted to read the quotations from Masonic works which were used in the argument.

The question debated was, "Resolved, that Freemasonry is anti-Christian and anti-republican." Elder Rathbun opened the debate with a full cannonade along the line of ordinary and familiar argument respecting the false religion, false charity, and general falsehood and pretense of Freemasonry. Evans, in his reply, quickly showed himself a trained debater, skilled in all the arts that affect an audience and gain their sympathy, though not necessarily convincing their understandings. He could quote Scripture to suit his purpose with as great facility as did the "Grand Master" of all lodgery to Christ himself. The first and second day Elder Rathbun seemed to be traveling in a circle. He adduced no new argument, and seemed to most of the listeners like a defeated man. Evans was led to take a supposed advantage of this apparent weakening of his opponent, and lost his wariness, making admissions that astonished the discerning Anti-masons. On the third and fourth days Elder Rathbun turned on him and used with powerful effect the admissions of his opponent respecting the standard works of the lodge, the oaths, the initiation ceremouy—indeed he did not deny the charges of Elder Rathbun in any essential particular, nor did he either admit them, yet argued throughout as though they were true.

When Bro. Faris, who kindly gives us these particulars, left Morning Sun on Friday afternoon, the debate was turning for the truth, and the evening promised a grand victory.

These few items will serve to sharpen the appetite of our readers for the full report, which we are happy to be able to promise next week.

LETTERS FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

TEMPERANCE CONVENTION.

Indianapolis. Apr. 3d.—Having an hour before train I dropped into the Third Presbyterian church in this city, at 2 P. M., where I found from 150 to 200 of Indiauas earnest temperance workers gathered in council. Among them I recognized several of our anti-secrecy friends who had come up to their State capital to do battle against the rum demon. I remained to hear the general secretary's report. Reports from local clubs showed that the enemy was ever ready to defend their craft by fair or foul means, and that at some points advances had been made at a sacrifice of property, reputation and even personal safety. Prohibition and no compromise was the watch-word, victory or death the rallying cry. The personal appearance of the convention showed that it was very largely "common people" from the rural districts, but I noticed one Masonic and several Odd-fellows badges, showing that enough of the craft were present to guard the secret brotherhoods against unfriendly legislation.

DANGER AHEAD FOR THE UNITED BRETHREN.

Veedersburg, Ind., April, 9th, 1883.

I reached this city on Saturday, at ten A. M. and made my way over very muddy roads to the home of our long-time friend, Rev. Wm. Hoobler, three miles in the country. I found the old gentleman hale and hearty at 75 years of age, and as full of religion and facts as the lodge is of blasphemy and lies. He has ceased to travel as a minister on account of his advanced age, but his accounts of the early settlements herc and reminiscenses of pioneer church work were intensely interesting. He has noted carefully the insidious approaches of the secret foe, and the gradual giving way of leaders in the church of his choice, and long and faithfully protested. He insists that the United Brethren church ought not to have "fellowship with unfruitful works of darkness," and that her ministers ought to "reprove them." He is considered "radical" and out of harmony with the "policy" and powers in the high places of the church, and has quietly withdrawn to walk with Christ alone. Bro. H. predicts a stormy time at the next United Brethren General Conference, and a more aggressive movement on the part of the "Nullifiers" than they have hitherto made. He interprets the "Peace policy" as a "blind," which, when stripped off, will show the lodge faction in legal possession of the establishments and finances of the church. Bro. Hoobler remembers when J. Q. Adams was candidate for re-election to the Presidency. He was a mere boy living in Sherman's Valley, Perry county, Penn. The place of voting was eight miles away. Ordinarily the poor people without horses did not attend the elections. At this time a rumor was industriously circulated that Mr. Adams was a Freemason, and that if elected the secret societies would get possession of the government. This rumor created great excitement and the "rich men who had horses" dispatched messengers to arouse the voters, and they were gathered up and furnished free transportation to go and vote against Mr. Adams so as to save the nation and perpetuate the liberties of the people. This is an instance of Diplomacy truly Masonic—worthy the craft, and as such I commend it to the consideration of all "Nullifiers"—"Non-resistents," "compromising," "policymen" in church and state. Father Hoobler gave three instances of aggravated murder in which the perpetrators had been released by their "brethren" of the "Mystic Tie."

On Sabbath morning I walked to town and made my way to the United Brethren church at the hour of worship. Meeting Rev. Thos. Beatty, the pastor, I accepted an invitation to preach to the people, and my remarks were listened to with apparent interest. Bro. B. announced that I would speak again in the evening, and assigned me to the care of Bro. James Weller, an "old time" United brother, to whom with his family I am indebted for many kindnesses. At the hour appointed the house was filled and I spoke for an hour and a half to young and old who gave the closest attention. The pastor informed me that all was quiet on the question of secrecy and that the people cared little or nothing about it. From what I learned from others I am of opinion that a little "heroic treatment" such as Bishops Edwards and Markwood were wont to give on this subject would "thaw out the 'possum," and that a rigid enforcement of law would diminish the adult male membership of the United Brethren church in Veedersburg by a dozen or more.

Meeting several prominent citizens of the place this morning they expressed a wish to have the subject of lodgery discussed, and will take the matter up and I trust report. I met in a store Rev. Franklin Dice, from Stone Bluffs, and Wm. Howard, Esq., from Newville, who both have decided views on the subject and are ready to co-operate in any judicious movement.

From what I have gathered during my brief trip in Central Indiana I feel justified in saying that it is one of the most hopeful and inviting fields anywhere opened in the rural districts and smaller towns. Wherever I made myself or my principles known, parties did not hesitate to identify themselves and express their sympathy. At railway depots, in hotels, on trains, and wherever the subject was broached, I found responsive hearts. There are obstacles it is true, and very great ones to a timid man; but grit and grace will overcome them and nothing else will. A lazy man, a cowardly man, a man who is anticipating dangers, had better give them all up to Christ and then start out with his sling or spear or whatever weapon God has given him, or else stay at home "until he is endued with power from on high." But the consecrated man may find an ample field for toil, sacrifice and reward in Central Indiana. J. P. Stoddard.

LECTURES BY FATHER TAYLOR.

Marshall, Ohio, April 3d, 1883.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—The people of this community were treated to two lectures on the evenings of March 20th and 21st by Rev. Warren Taylor, of South Salem, Ohio, exposing secrecy. On the evening of the 20th he spoke of "Freemasonry as a Government." The next evening "Freemasonry as a Religion." There was one Freemason in the audience and several Odd-fellows. These lectures have roused some who favor secrecy, and set others to thinking about the matter, and I hope have done good.

I think it is time the subject was agitated every where, but the system is like its master, crying out, saying, "Let us alone. You do not know anything about us. You never were in the lodge." Tell them there are good men that have been. They say, "Well, we can't believe them because they are perjured villains. They have broken their oath." But I think it better to have broken this oath than to have kept it. Very respectfully,

Eli Templin.

New England.

THE NEW ENGLAND BOARD of the National Christian Association has its headquarters at No. 8 Portland St., Worcester, Mass. A full supply of books and tracts constantly on hand. Orders promptly filled. Correspondence solicited.

E. D. Bailey N. E. Sec'y.

Mr. Spaulding writes from Northampton that he is having good success there and at Hadley. He will remain there several days longer.

Mr. J. S. Perham writes that he heard the lecture of O. C. Bailey at South Northfield, Vermont, last week, and it was very good. He thinks the speaker will make a strong man for the cause if he keeps humble and trusts in the Lord, and he wishes he might remain in the State, lecturing till the time of the State meeting.

Josiah Divol, of Topsham, writes as follows: "I am most decidedly in favor of holding the convention, if there is any prospect of success. I am willing to do what I can by way of contributions. As to the time of convention, I fear that April will be the worst month. There are some friends here who can be relied on to do all in their power to aid the movement."

The following extracts from the letters of O. C. Bailey will be read with interest: "We read 'As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about them that fear him.' Here, in the midst of the hills, one can realize the meaning of the words. Yesterday I talked with a Congregational minister. He said he had a friend who is a Mason of seven degrees and a minister. He asked his friend how it was, if what they say is true of Masonry, that he go so far? His reply was, 'I don't find anything bad in Masonry!' An elderly gentleman said in the presence of other Masons, 'I have been a Mason in the past, and pretty well up, but don't suppose I should be recognized as one now, because I don't go to the lodge. I believe that their oaths ought to be prohibited by law, and will be sometime.' They seem to want the degrees worked around here. I think the right man can find plenty of places to do good, but to get much support he must have a well known record or it will be up-hill work for a time. But the friends here know what the truth is, and will be ready to back it up with their prayers and money. I think the field here looks in every way encouraging, and we hope for a good convention."

OLD LOVE REVIVING.

Worcester, Mass., April 10, 1883.

The absorbing topic with us now is the Vermont convention. That State has a reputation for integrity and propriety which every Vermonter ought to be proud of and it is astonishing that the lodges should ever have gained a footing on its soil. It is noticeable (to the credit of the State) that Masonic and Odd-fellow journals do not claim it as very strongly favorable to their interests. Their principles find a hard soil to grow in. Friends of reform there hold a different view, doubtless with good reason, but this arises chiefly from the known fact of the indifference of good people to a reform movement about which they have as yet but little knowledge. The waters need stirring there, before we can know just what to depend upon.

Before leaving Randolph brother O. C. Bailey, who is working up the convention, secured the refusal of a hall, provided friends desired to go there. At Montpelier he found the only hall to be had was the Capitol Hall, with a seating capacity of 500 or 600, at an expense of $32, for two nights and a day. Nearly all our correspondents favored holding the convention at this most central point. The papers there would not only help the convention locally but give a wider circulation to its proceedings. At Groton a church could be had, without expense, and free entertainment might be had for some of the delegates, but Groton is a very small village, not so central as Montpelier and without any local papers.

The most favorable prospect now before us is to hold the convention at Montpelier, May 29th and 30th. This will probably be the conclusion reached by the friends, after consultation. Of course every one will cheerfully acquiesce in whatever conclusion is reached after mature consideration. All correspondents have insisted that the convention should be put as late as possible, so that settled weather and passable roads might favor us. There seems to be but one opinion about the advisability of this movement. The time is ripe for decisive action. Let no man falter. We have good plans to propose for a programme as soon as the time and place are definitely fixed.

Last week was spent by me in Boston. There is no doubt but we shall find access to that city in due time. Progress is being made there but it does not appear so quickly as in a smaller place where little things look great.

Here in Worcester we have interested a number of ladies in the work of loaning books to friends. Finney, the Broken Seal, Freemasonry Illustrated, and the new stories do excellent service wherever they are read. We have already gained in this way many allies to our movement. In some cases young men and young ladies have read these books with intense interest and astonishment, concluding their reading with a declaration of eternal hostility to secret societies. In one family where one of the books went four young ladies and a young man read the book and became deeply interested in the subject.

A letter comes to me this morning which is like a bugle blast. How many others are moved in the same way? Here are some extracts:

"I feel that some systematic effort should be made to establish the work in H—. I do not feel satisfied with the result of our convention. I have no doubt that good was done but it should be followed with earnest, persistent effort on our part to reach the people. I have been thinking that if an arrangement could be made for you to supply some place one Sabbath in each month for several months we might gain the attention of the common people and perhaps lay the foundation for permanent work.

"I feel that we must do more in New England. I cannot feel satisfied to remain quiet and behold the ruin and destruction that is being wrought in all our communities and not make an effort to help the Lord against the mighty powers that contest his authority. I want to do more and I believe that I can with the Lord's help. If some plan like the foregoing can be carried out I will give one dollar more per month and I have no doubt but there are numbers of others who will be glad to help when they can see that it is for the purity of the Gospel that you are laboring. If we cannot secure the attention of D. D.s and college faculties let us try and reach the common people who heard Christ gladly."

The plan suggested by our brother of holding stated meetings in different places is certainly a good one. The longer a meeting continues in a place the more the people hear of it. The only drawback to such a movement is the fact that there are not persons in any one place to bear the expense. This difficulty could only be overcome by "pooling" the contributions of several places to maintain one. This is certainly practicable. Let us have more on the same subject. E. D. Bailey.

HOW TO WORK.

Many men who become informed of the evils of secret societies, have never been accustomed to lead campaigns of any sort and they find their efforts to enlist their neighbors unsatisfactory. Many men chafe under the opposition and weary of the long waiting for results. A few words of counsel may help and encourage such persons.

Let it be remembered that every cause must have time for a natural growth and its progress cannot always be outwardly observed. We wonder why every one does not think immediately as we think and do as we do, yet this is not to be expected in any case, especially not in one involving so many interests of such diverse character. What would be thought of one who sowed the seed but made no allowance for the time of natural growth? Perhaps men ought to think faster and act quicker, but generally they will not, and for this result we must be fully prepared.

One of the most important lessons for a reformer to learn is that of patience. Diligence and patience combined will eventually triumph. Diligence without patience is self-destructive; patience without diligence is sinful neglect, but the two combined are irresistible.

They are wisest who work most systematically. Find out the temperament and principles of your neighbors. Make up your mind who are most candid, and commence to inform them of the reform. Do not bore them with wild, ranting assertions, but cultivate their acquaintance and by maintaining, as Paul says, "the form of sound speech," win their respect and work upon their convictions.

One who has faith in his cause cannot afford to give way to despondency or doubt. Pursue a straightforward, honest, wise and fearless course and it will command the respect of others. The conflict which God wages is certain to triumph and in him should be our confidence.

—"G. C." of Madaline, N. Y., writes to the N. Y., Witness of the Morgan abduction:—"Was Morgan murdered by the Masons? My father, who was a Mason of high degree and who established a lodge here and was its Master for many years, said near the close of his life that there was not a particle of doubt that Morgan was murdered by the Masons. His information came through Masonic sources. He also said it was entirely wrong and was a great blow to Masonry, so much so that many lodges disbanded and did not meet again for many years. The last effort made to show (since the late Thurlow Weed disclosure) that he was only banished and not killed is, in common parlance, 'a little too thin,' as even Mason's admit that he was hustled from place to place and finally imprisoned, a high-handed outrage that without doubt ended in his murder."

CORRESPONDENCE.

A PLEASANT VISIT.

Last Tuesday, March 27, '83, I stepped into the office of the Earnest Christian at Rochester, and was happy to receive the cordial greeting of the editor, Bro. B. T. Roberts. He kindly invited me to take the afternoon train and visit him at his home in North Chili.

It was a comfort to meet his pleasant family and enjoy their hospitality. After ten I attended the student's class meeting held in the dining rooms of the Seminary at North Chili. It was an intelligent, devout and spiritual feast. The evidence given that the young men and women who are there acquiring a Christian culture would go out to enlighten and bless the world, was an inspiration.

The school has good buildings in a quiet and healthy location. And upon inquiry I learned it has attained a good local reputation. Mr. B. H. Roberts and wife are the principals. They appear to be competent teachers, capable to give wise direction in governing the school and really enjoy their work.

Since I visited the school and learned its advantages and wants I have been wondering why some Free Methodist who has the means does not buy two hundred acres of land adjoining the Seminary and give it to the school so that young men who wish to can have an opportunity to earn something to assist them in pursuing a regular course of study. It would be a noble act bringing rich blessings to many young men so that they could be able to bless others. Isaac Hyatt.

NATIONAL PROHIBITORY LAWS.

Manamuskin Manor, N. J.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—It is claimed by the friends of the rum traffic, that every person has a natural and constitutional right to do with his property what he pleases, and that he may convert or wholly destroy the same and the State has no right to interfere. Can such a theory be sustained by reason, moral or civil law? Has a man a right to kill a valuable horse for his hide, or burn his house for the ashes to fertilize his soil, or set fire to his wheat stack to amuse his children. How long would such a man be permitted to act thus, before the State would assert its right to restrain and punish such conduct. And yet, in each case named it would not be total destruction, but conversion. There would remain something valuable. Notwithstanding the man who acted thus, would find himself in prison or a mad house.

Is the taking of that which God has given us for bread, and for the want of which thousands starve annually, to convert it into that which is of no real value, a lawful and laudable transaction? The man who kills his horse for his hide, or burns his house and stack has done a pardonable act, as compared with him who destroys bread to make rum. In the first instance much was destroyed and but little left; but no lives were lost on that account. But in the latter case nothing is left but a poison residuum, which inebriates and destroys the lives of those who use it, and yet, this God-defying and hell-destroying business claims, and is protected by law. Nothing short of a national prohibitory law will secure men from the evil of this traffic. Until this tree of evil is plucked up, root and branch, it will live in spite of all other efforts to stop its growth. Local option is a political dodge, a subterfuge of politicians to shift responsibilities that belonged to them as law-makers. All systems of license are crimes against the people and the welfare of the nation, and like local option are a makeshift of the wickedest kind. Local option simply drives the rum drinker to another town or country to purchase that which he cannot get at home; and so he buys by the gallon, instead of the drink, which in a pecuniary sense is to his advantage, for he gets a greater quantity for his money, and therefore can afford to drink more freely. Never will drunkenness and its attendant evils be banished from our land by such measures; not until the Government of the United States shall make laws prohibiting the conversion of bread into poison.

TEMPERANCE BY LODGERY.

Editor Christian Cynosure:—Nearly ever since my enlightenment on Freemasonry I have watched the Cynosure to learn from it also, the relation of Good Templarism both to Masonry (its mother) and to temperance proper; by which last I mean Gospel temperance.

That the Christian public should have allowed the lodge to subsidize and appropriate to its own base use the institution of temperance, its money, its press, its influence, is certainly a horrid commentary on the civilization and enlightenment of the age; as if a father should give to a saloon-keeper, for rearing, his affectionate child.

In the first place, had the church done its duty, temperance societies would be uncalled for, and unnecessary. Wherein, therefore, the church has been derelict, it is now proposed to supplement the task by the agency and work of Satan himself. To forget God and make alliance with the wicked has always been a snare that resulted, only one way, continually; and yet the course is persisted in with unabated zeal and fervor; with whole churches and ministers of the Gospel, even, wondering, and conjecturing why success is not attained.

With many prevails the popular but unhallowed maxim that "the end justifies the means." Many of these, too, profess to believe the Bible, and know, that in times without number God delivered them; brought about purity and order, often, and usually under circumstances less favorable than these of the present time; but this aid was always given under certain conditions, and when the people placed themselves in a specific attitude before God; never before. The trouble is, people—the churches, even, "stagger at the promises." But, perhaps, the inherent love of idolatry, and of the things of this world excels the desire to be delivered, whereupon, formerly a cry was made to God, and in answer to which always came, and now would come deliverance. "Take good heed therefore unto yourselves, that ye love the Lord your God, else if ye do in anywise go back, and cleave unto the remnant of these nations....know for a certainty that the Lord your God will no more drive out any of these nations from before you; but they shall be snares and traps unto you, and scourges in your sides and thorns in your eyes—Josh. 23:11–13; also Judges 2:2, "Ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land; ye shall throw down their altars; but ye have not obeyed my voice; why have ye done this? Wherefore, I also said, I will not drive them out from before you; but they shall be as thorns in your sides, and their gods shall be a snare unto you."

Being heirs to the same promise with these and for no other reason, the children of God have a hope—a remedy which need not fail. But the conditions are quite unmistakable; and how it is that with the meridian sun pouring light on the Sacred Word, there should yet be such persistence with contrary and forbidden means, does not readily appear; except from the standpoint of a pitable decline in piety, and in personal knowledge of God.

In reading the history, the trials, the conflicts, and the captivities of the Israelites from the time of Joshua down, the conviction grows, that of all the pretentions to reform, few, if any, seem to us more loathsome and detestable in the sight of God, than the mockery and idolatry of the secret temperance orders. In the prayer of Jesus, John 17:17, he says "sanctify them through thy truth." This is the only sanctifier—the only power that can prepare for heaven. Vain and delusive must be the hope to reform, to reclaim, or to save by any other means. The mistaken notion that because the intention is good, because the motives are right, some, or any other "end will justify the means," it must be seen, is but a "refuge of lies," which the "hail shall sweep away." Terrible, indeed, is his responsibility, who engages, systematically, in giving false comfort; what then, of the professing Christians who aid in Christless means of saving men, such as that of the lodge? J. C. Schoenberger.

COMPARING NOTES.

Edward S. Morris, the Quaker philanthropist of Philadelphia, whose efforts for the education of native Africans is an enterprise which appeals to every true American, is an example for all our reform boys and girls in his fidelity to the Fifth Commandment. He says:

"Since reading your paper, I see its wrongfulness [of Masonry] more than ever. All my youthful associates when I was 18 years old joined the Masons. They cut my acquaintance because I would not go with them. My precious father and mother said 'No;' and their yes and no was ever my law. Oh how thankful I am to-day for such parents."

Bro. Cyrus Smith, of Clearfield, Iowa, calls attention to a grave misrepresentation current among some of our United Brethren friends. The Cynosure never brought so grievous a charge against Bishop Weaver as that mentioned, but has called attention editorially to the fact that he has at times given "aid and comfort" to those who were opposing the position of the U. B. church on the lodge question. Bro. Smith may feel free to correct such stories as this:

"A good brother who is traveling in the ministry told me that the Cynosure man said that Bishop Weaver belonged to the Masons. I asked him what Cynosure man; and he said Blanchard. I told him I did not think it was so. I know that the General Agent, J. P. Stoddard, when he was in Mt. Ayr a year ago last June did not speak ill of the Bishop, nor did that excellent Cynosure man, Rev. H. H. Hinman, when he was in Mormontown two or three years ago. I remember that Pres. Blanchard and the Bishop did some sharp shooting and that was all right providing the arrows were pointed with love and directed by the Holy Ghost."

Josiah Shaw of Eau Claire, Wis., very aged and nearly blind, sends among his last contributions a little sketch of an incident which early convinced him of the evil of Freemasonry:

"In the year 1828 I worked in Montpelier, Vt., in a small crew. Our foreman, a steady, good man of 25 or 26 years, named Post, a Mason. Another of our crew, named Kimball, was taking the North Star, published in Danville by two brothers named Eaton, who had seceded and turned their paper against Masonry. Mr. Post was reading the paper one evening and gave quite a laugh. Kimball said, 'What is it, Post?' He laughed again, and answered, 'I was reading here about a place they have in Masonic halls, a kind of jog that is in the floor that is lower than the rest. I wonder if they have such a place in our hall here?' Kimball replied, 'Yes.' Post denied it. Kimball said, 'I know they have.' 'How do you know it?' 'I helped paint it.' Not long after this I heard a seceder and Mason talk, and it was evident the Mason was not willing to own the truth, how they deceived the public by sending their charters back to the State lodge pretending to be dead."

AMERICAN POLITICS.

NOMINATIONS FOR 1884.

For President,
JONATHAN BLANCHARD
OF ILLINOIS.

For Vice President,
JOHN A. CONANT,
OF CONNECTICUT.

PLATFORM.

We hold: 1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That God requires and man needs a Sabbath.

3. That the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is the true policy on the temperance question.

4. That the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

5. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by articles 13th, 14th and 15th of our amended Constitution should be preserved inviolate.

6. That arbitration of differences with nations is the most direct and sure method of securing and perpetuating a permanent peace.

7. That to cultivate the intellect without improving the morals of men, is to make mere adepts and experts; therefore, the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

8. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

9. That the government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

10. That maintenance of the public credit, protection to all loyal citizens, and justice to Indians are essential to the honor and safety of our nation.

11. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice-president of the United States.

QUESTIONS IN MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

CASE.

A certain class of men rebel against their government, fight against it, and occasion it a great loss of life and treasure; but the government, defended by loyal men, is finally sustained.

Now the question is:

First. Would it be morally right for the government to give pensions to rebels and loyalists both alike?

Second. Would it be morally right for General Butler, or any other Masonic candidate for the Presidency, to agree to give pensions to "both armies" if elected?

Third. Would it be morally right for a loyal veteran of sound body and mind, to accept a pension on the ground of his voting, one to every rebel soldier?

Fourth. Was it morally right in Freemason Butler to vote for rich Jefferson Davis for President, and then hang one of said Davis's poor drunken, friendless followers?

Fifth. Would it be morally right to vote for General Butler, or any other Masonic candidate for the Presidency, on the ground of his giving a pension to every veteran, veteran's oldest son and veteran's widow of the first, second, third and fourth wedlock, as long as they shall survive?

Sixth. Would it be morally right to heighten the tariff in order to bestow high pensions on "both armies?"

Seventh. Does not moral rectitude require that the pensions of Mexican War veterans, Indian War veterans, War of 1812 veterans, and the Revolutionary veterans be equalized with the pensions of the rebel war, and be dated back, so as to render the heirs and descendants of those veterans equal to those of the young veterans of the present day?

Eighth. Is the Masonic level and square policy which says, "If you hang one, you must hang them all," and if you pension one you must pension all, based on sound moral principle?

Ninth. Was General Butler morally right in hanging the American Mumford and letting off the foreign Freemason, Pierce Soule?

ELECTION-DAY INCIDENTS.

In the year 1827 Rev. Charles G. Finney, the eminent evangelist, held a series of meetings in Stephentown, N. Y..during which the November elections occurred throughout the State. Mr. Finney looked forward to election day, in that town, with considerable anxiety, fearing that the excitement connected with such occasions would greatly hinder the work he was trying to promote. He accordingly exhorted Christians to pray earnestly that this might not be the case. On the evening of election day, after he had preached and had come out of the pulpit, and some had left the church, a Christian man occupying a pew in the corner of the house beckoned to him to come to the seat in which he sat. In that pew was a gentleman who had been one of the number to receive the votes during the day. He was so greatly overcome with conviction of sin as to be unable to leave his seat. Mr. Finney conversed and prayed with the man until he found pardon and peace by believing on the Lord Jesus Christ.

When Mr. F. left this pew, and was about to retire from the church, his attention was directed to a seat on the opposite side of the room. Here was another man, who also had been appointed to receive votes at the election. He too was so overpowered by the truth as not to be able to leave the place. The evangelist dealt with him in about the same way as with the other man, with a similar result.

It may seem strange that men occupying such positions at a public election should even be in attendance at a religious meeting on such an evening. But that they, whose minds one would suppose would be greatly absorbed with things pertaining to the election, should be both convicted of sin and converted to God on that evening, may appear stranger still. Mr. Finney's solicitude seemed to be more especially that the minds of Christians might not be diverted from the meeting and the work in which they were engaged. How often the Lord exceeds the expectations of his faithful children!

Election day excitements usually unfit men for serious and earnest religious thought and exercises; but when Christians give themselves to believing prayer, not only will they themselves be greatly blessed, but often such persons are converted whom they hardly dared to believe would be saved. But nothing is too good or too hard for God to do.—Evangelical Messenger.

OBITUARY.

LINUS CHITTENDEN.

The subject of this short sketch was born in Chittenden county, Vermont, in 1802, and spent his youth and early manhood in that State. He became a Christian in his youth, and through life maintained a Christian character. He became identified with the temperance cause, and for many years has abstained from all intoxicants of every kind, and never in his long life used tobacco in any form. In 1826 or 1827 he joined that organization known as "Freemasons," and continued in it long enough to see its unchristian and unrepublican tendencies, its folly and falsehood, as well as its despotism. He left it of his own accord, saying, "This is no place for a Christian man, and there is nothing in it worthy of any rational mind."

In the fall of the year of 1881 he and his wife left Crystal Lake, Ill., where they had resided for many years, and made their home with their son, Dr. R. H. Chittenden, in Lyndon, Osage county, Kansas, where he was called to his rest, March 21st, 1883, aged 80 years, 8 months and 11 days. He was a kind husband and a fond and affectionate father; kindly to everybody, and his gentlemanly deportment in his daily walk endeared him to his large circle of friends and acquaintances. F.

"HE WAS A GOOD MAN, AND FULL OF THE HOLY GHOST AND OF FAITH."

AN OUTLINE OF THE ADDRESS AT THE FUNERAL OF HON. J. B. BLOSS, BY REV. C. C. FOOTE.

To accurately delineate the character of a finished life is a work of great delicacy. My acquaintance with our departed friend and brother commenced fifty-six years ago, in a revival that witnessed the conversion of nearly a hundred persons. His first religious awakening was from a sermon by the celebrated evangelist, Rev. Dr. Nettleton. The depth and pungency of these youthful impressions were a good qualification for his after successful labors for others. At the age of seventeen he became superintendent for a Sunday school, and until age was upon him he was a successful laborer in this department of Christian activity. But the great impulse of his eventful life was received during one of the greatest revivals of the nineteenth century in connection with the labors of Pres. Finney, in the city of Rochester. In that wondrous revival he was an active participant. The Divine anointing then vouchsafed to him was as the mantle of Elijah to the end of life. Lay preaching is supposed to have had its origin in our day, but our dear brother was a successful lay preacher a half century ago, and the fruits of these labors are accorded on high.

It was in the midst of these wondrous revivals connected with the labors of Mr. Finney, that three great National Reforms were inaugurated, each to continue until its legitimate mission should be accomplished. And with these reforms our brother identified himself heart and soul and hand. Dealing in intoxicants was in those days considered an entirely honorable vocation. But no sooner was the evil of this practice seen than five hundred dollars worth of liquor was turned into the gutter; and then commenced the opposition of anti-reformers that followed him well nigh to the grave. His devotion to the temperance reform is well known throughout the commonwealth of Michigan.

In the overthrow of the secret, oath-bound organization of Masonry, which in that day held such fearful and almost universal sway over the pulpit and forum, the bar and the bench, the press and the State as well, the uncompromising man of God acted a prominent part. The man whose life was as transparent as the light, could but set his face as a flint against the secret works of darkness that were revealed in Masonry in that day. He was an intimate friend and co-laborer with Thurlow Weed. How could such a man but be found on the side of the oppressed as against the oppressor. Hence from the beginning of the anti-slavery agitation to its end, we was identified with the friends of the slave.

If we penetrate to the inner life of this man of God we shall there find the spring and fountain of the life devoted to "doing good to others." Like Enoch he walked with God. God was a perpetual presence to his inner consciousness, hence his life was a living testimony against every form of sin. Out of such a life sprang the reformer and a life of self-abnegation. Few men were more at home with the great truths of the divine government, and few were more ready to proclaim and defend them.

To have shared his confidence, his friendship and society was more precious than rubies. Through the checkered scenes of a long life he was well furnished for the new home of the saints in the world to come. Trials and temptations, afflictions and perplexities, fears, losses and sorrows, sickness, pain and bereavements, heart longings and hope deferred, weary days, and nights without slumber and longing for the day of the Lord to come, all these were attendants upon his pilgrimage, but shall be no more for ever. "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints."

If now we place beside such a life spent in the Divine service, all worldly honor, fame and renown, worldly treasures, palaces and gold, all are lighter than the small dust of the balance, of the earth earthy, and to perish as in a day, but the other to abide forever.

DISLOYAL POLICY.

The persistent and hopeful efforts being put forth by the advocates and apologists of the lodge, to force secretists into the communion of the church, calls for a few reflections. Secretism is a combination to overreach and dupe the people. Else why its exceeding carefulness to conceal its doings, enforced with the most stringent oaths and obligations, and accompanied with threatened penalties? It relies on the docility of its rank and file, and on the good nature and inactivity of those against whom it conspires. It is aided even now by the supineness of many anti-secrecy men in the United Brethren church. It depends on its serfs and its foes being like the elephant in the hands of his keeper, not knowing his strength. Its underlings even known only so much of the will of their lords as their masters see fit to reveal to them, to enable them to be good servants. Besides it employs many outsiders to do gratis work for it as advocates and apologists, as witness scores of ministers, and not a few members, of the United Brethren Church, who are rewarded by its smiles and compliments. It depends on its admirers, apologists, and servants to do most of its active militant work.

Secretism does not wish to include the masses in its organization. An oligarchy would extinguish itself by including the people in its number. Secretism sets itself up as a syndicate to run the church and the state. After the murder of William Morgan in the state of New York, it was found that three-fourths of the civil offices in the State were in the hands of Freemasons, though that order included ouly a small part of the citizens of the commonwealth. How little different is it today in most of the States of the Union, as to Masons and Odd-fellows. And when secretists can thrust enough of their members into a local church or into a religious denomination, its work there is almost a duplicate of its work in the State. How well the Epispocal Church, the Methodist Epispocal, and some other religious denominations are under the control of the lodge is too well known, and too generally conceded, to require particular notice. What else should rational men expect the lodges to do? Conspiracies are not formed on a grand scale, without intent to find fields to harvest. If that were not the original intent of the organization, opportunity would give birth to the intention and nourish its growth. Any one who would not expect such a result from a grand conspiracy would be verdant indeed.

The scheme to run the United Brethren Church in the anti-law interests is after the model furnished by secretists. Somehow the spirit and methods of secretism in the lodge and of its sympathizers outside of the lodge are much the same. Like secretism in the lodge, sympathy with it outside of the lodge scouts any law higher than its own. It claims to "have the brains," and it is right if "brains" consist in the cunning of the fox or the subtilty of the wiliest of all foes. But it is very unlike that wisdom which is from above. How unlike the wisdom of Christ is that of the unscrupulous diplomatist or of the adept in priestcraft. Why should anti-law resogt so much to boasting and why so much trust in tricks, on assumption and on presumption?

The anti-law spirit in our church does some strange things. It deals in logic so cheap that it could not apply the same to any other question. Its catch-cries, as "fanaticism" applied to very temperate opponents of the lodge, are much after the fashion of demagoguery. It presumes on the peace-loving spirit of the pure to yield to its lawless demands, or at most to assume only the defensive. It chuckles over its ill-gotten victories like professionals over their sharp practices. It systematically takes hold of places of power. It is alert in securing the general offices of the church. It seizes the helm at our colleges wherever practicable, most assiduously thrusting its own disciples into vacant college presidencies and professorships. Its presumption in doing an unlawful thing and then assuming that those who dissent are "troublers of Israel," is truly wonderful. But, after the manner of the lodge, it most excels in lauding its advocates and in depreciating all who stand in the way of its success.—Richmond Star.

—One prayer in Christ's name is worth more than ten millions in the name of love, friendship and fidelity or any other catchwords that men would make pass ports to heaven.—Dr. Wm. Johnson.

—Be not unequally yoked together. The Christian who goes into a business partnership with an ungodly man will ere long be obliged to abandon his religion or withdraw from the firm. The maxims of the business world are so generally wrong that the Christian will have the short end of the yoke, i. e. he will have to do his share of the pulling at a great disadvantage.—Sandy Lake News.

A NEATLY PRINTED SIXTEEN PAGE WEEKLY JOURNAL, UNSECTARIAN AND OPPOSED TO SECRET SOCIETIES.

THE POLE STAR OF REFORM.

EVERY Christian, every Prohibitionist and every Patriot should read it for the following among other reasons:

1. Because it meets the wants of the general public by giving in brief the latest reliable information on all questions of Reform, having the special object of exposing and opposing organized secrecy. Besides able editorial, contributed and selected articles upon this topic, which is of more than national importance, it has interesting sketches of progress and incidents from the reform lecturers in all parts of the country, reform news and notes, letters from the Old World, etc., etc. It is the especial organ of this movement in America—a movement which is sustained by the utterances of some of the ablest statesmen and divines whom the country has produced. Every person interested in either the family, government, or religion—the most sacred interests of humanity—is directly affected by secret societies, and needs to keep posted in this movement.

2. Because it is uncompromising on ALL questions of the day. On temperance, tobacco, Sabbath desecration, Mormonism, the Southern and Indian questions, civil-service reform, monopolies, the rights of labor, and every other question, its only aim is to be RIGHT, and advocate the TRUTH. It is hence FEARLESS and OUTSPOKEN.

2. Because it emphasizes the fact that political action should be directed by conscience enlightened by the WORD and SPIRIT of God and that Christ must be acknowledged KING of NATIONS, and presents a platform epitomizing the science of civil governments based on the supreme authority of the DIVINE WORD.

4. Because, in addition to these features, it contains a choice selection of wholesome reading for the family, from oldest to youngest, with religious and secular news, market reports, etc.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, APRIL 19, 1883.

EDITORIAL LETTERS.

WASHINGTON NOTES.

Dr. Gregory, late of Illinois Industrial University, has given to a large audience here, one of the very ablest arguments for the truth of the Bible, and one of the most eloquent. How he ever lived and endured the lodge surroundings at Champaign is not easily conceived. From the tone and spirit of his address I am sure he must loathe it. I spoke with him after meeting and shall see him again. He is here as one of the new Civil Service Commissioners.

Rev. Dr. Chester of the Metropolitan Presbyterian church here has never joined any secret society. He is commissioner to the General Assembly at Saratoga next May. He was the mover of the resolution to invite me to sit in the Washington City Presbytery here last week. So "the Father worketh hitherto," and Christ worketh.

The William Wirt Monument is the most resplendent in the Congressional burying ground. I hope to describe it and him for the Cynosure readers. I think I wrote that Morgan's monument excels Mr. Lincoln's here; both in quality, size and beauty of execution.

Rev. B. T. Roberts preached a faithful and forcible sermon lately, here in Washington, from the text, Rev. 3: 4: "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis, who have not defiled their garments." His indictment of the lodge-abominations was incidental, but clear and explicit. In Chambersburg I was told that he sharply censured that holiness secking which confines itself to inward experiences, and does not remove the stumbling blocks of popular sins.

The colored people's orders are far more numerous than the thirty-four whose names are given in the Cynosure of March 29. In a barber shop I met a "Fisherman of Gallilee," who said his order of that name already amounted to thousands; and he put on all the airs and hollow pretensions of a Masonic lodgeman. He says they blindfold their initiates, and have already eleven degrees. It is about twenty years since at Mt. Vernon, Ohio, I forced through the American Missionary Association, a resolution warning the ex-slaves, who were then clay in the hands of their white friends, against these worships of Satan. Prayerful, decided action at that time would have saved thousands on thousands, who are now wedded to Christless lodge-worships, which consumes their time, money and morals, and sends them into eternal night, with hoodwinks over the eyes of their minds.

"Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee: the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain." Ps. 76: 10. This is signally verified here in Washington at this time. Two secret society chaplains, with their books under their arms, were present and pressed to take charge of a funeral. The church was full of secretists, and their anger and rage were unbounded that their chaplains were rejected. The funeral exercises were broken up and I came away. A Knight of Pythias, as I came out, said to me, "This is very strange; I was interested and wished to hear you through." The press was induced to publish falsehoods, and attempt to cast odium upon me. A clear correction was published by the leading Washington paper. A Mason, who is a prominent professional man, said to me that the conduct of the secretists was "infamous;" and that if I would give a Bible reading on secret societies, he "would come and bring all his friends;" and I have since received kind words from several prominent clergymen of the District.

Swindling.—The sums paid to the lodge by the clerks and mechanics of Washington are simply enormous! Multitudes pay dues to two, three, or even five or six orders, to get or keep government places. Yet the men are so nearly all in, that the promised partiality is impossible. This is wholesale swindling; and supports a multitude of cunning and idle loafers as officials. If the facts can be got and published the members will wheel off by platoons.

RELIGIOUS POLITICS.

Since Jefferson (1801) we have swung off from religion. But we are on the return. Twenty-five years ago it was deemed a reproach for Christian ministers to have and express opinions on political questions. That reproach has passed away. And now also ultra political partizan sheets publish revivals, converts and additions to churches; and temperance articles are becoming staple.

The process seems to be this: Christianity enlightens its masses, and is the occasion of corrupting its ministers, changing them into priests. And as, since Christ's priesthood is perpetual and since he came there are no priests but usurpers and counterfeits, the cry of the French sans culottes, "Tout l'Eveque a la lanterne," (every bishop to the lamp-post,) is the joint effort of an enlightened populace and a corrupt clergy.

The celebrated Necker, the minister of Louis XVI., undertook to stem the tide of popular rage which swept off thrones, clergy and nobility, by writing a book, to show that public order could not stand without religion. He proved his point in theory, and atheists proved it in practice, till Frenchmen fled back to religion to save their throats from each others knives.

Necker's argument was, that if you take away religion, nothing remains to keep men in order but philosophy, fame and force. He argues that philosophy cannot keep up public order, any more than it can keep men from suffocating each other, by crowding for the door of a burning theatre; though every one knows that more would be saved by moving out orderly and slowly. As to opinion or fame, that can affect but the few who become popular; and force is the power of the mob, which will not restrain itself, when the multitude is cheated and enraged by corrupt leaders. And he, Necker, argues with great beauty and force that, "The single idea of a God is the only and sufficient support of morality and public order."

But Necker's book floated on the passions of the Revolution, like a feather on foam; though his arguments were sound and himself one of the most popular of men.

Now a process is going on in this city which is making Washington the Paris of the United States. There are already here fifty-nine more secret lodges than there are churches, counting synagogue and all. The colored people here, though only one-third or less of the whole population, have more than fifty different secret orders; all of them despotisms, governed by one Grand Lodge at the top. They all—little new "orders" of mechanics even—have chaplains, prayers and promises of salvation by rituals and obedience to unknown superiors. And I have found but one mechanic here who has drawn out more money for sickness than he has paid into his clan, though thousands on thousands pay in more than they draw out.

My office is but a few steps from the Star Route trials. The leading lawyer on the side of the government is a Democrat and was a rebel; and Dorsey's leading lawyer is an atheist, the modern Jack Falstaff of infidelity, who hates and abhors all priests but Masonic priests. And I am told that it would be as difficult to find a lawyer in that crowd who is not a mason, as to find a black man in the cities of the South, who is not, at least, part white, as the result of slavery.

Day after day, day after day, crowds of intelligent blacks spend the live-long day studying law outside the bar in the Star Route courts. I have run in three or four minutes often during the day, the same crowd is forever there. They are probably officers who run the secret orders, live on the secret taxes and are learning shrewdness to live without work!

Now the people here, white and colored are Americans like the rest of us: no better, no worse. But Satan gives his profoundest attention to the capital cities of nations, and especially the capital of our Republic, which is the world's last hope, and its destruction is the last hope of the devil!

But while this enemy of God and man is coming in like a flood the Spirit of God is here lifting up a standard against him. A city official called on me to-day whose mind is as clear and as sternly set against these secret orders as any of ours; and the number of such is steadily increasing.

In the days of Alfred, Wickliffe and of Cromwell, though centuries apart, English politics swung back toward religion, and continents and nations, our own among them, have felt the power of such religious politics.

—Bro. J. Tanner, Jr., who has been living at Kingston, Tennessee, for several months hoping for restoration to health, writes that he intends returning to Boston if his strength will permit. He is very feeble and his trouble has become so severe as to cause bleeding of the lungs almost daily. We are sorry indeed at such news. May God help this brother and restore his strength.

—Attention should be given particularly to the General Agent's letters in this number. The facts respecting the defection of leading members of the United Brethren church are alarming, and call loudly for the prayerful consideration of every godly man and woman in that denomination.

A REPRESENTATIVE CASE.

While purchasing an article recently from a gentleman known to be a Master Mason and who was aware of the progress of Anti-masonry, he remarked, "I presume it is not best for me as I am situated to say very much about the secret orders, but my views on that subject are not materially different from yours. I took three degrees in one night under dispensation, as it was called. There were three of us joined that night and after the lodge closed we all went to a saloon for drinks. It was something I was not used to and I didn't like it. I thought it was a strange way of promoting temperance and benefiting men. I have only visited a lodge twice since, but presume it is better for me not to say much about it."

There are two or three points worth noticing in this casual remark of a temperance business man.

1. The deception used in luring him into the snare spread in secret under the false and hollow pretext that it was a fit place for a decent man to go; and that his connection with the order would be a benefit to him, when the Master and every member who had gone there before him knew they were practicing a lie.

2. It is another among many instances that have come to light showing that the night lodge is the hotbed of semi-respectable dram-drinking, and hence, as well as for other reasons, a prolific source of poverty and crime.

This gentleman was and is a thorough temperance man in principle and practice, but wearied with the senseless drill of initiation, cowed and humiliated by loss of self-respect, hard pressed by jolly brethren, and covered by the shadow of night, he yielded, as thousands have done who unlike him have not the manliness and courage to rally when second sober thought returned. It would be well for some of the radical temperance workers to look narrowly into this question, and it may safely be predicted, that, after making all possible allowance for good intentions, they will find that the cause for which they labor loses a hundred-fold more than it gains every year by connection with secrecy. If the statistics could be obtained, it would appear that while one drunkard has been saved by mixing temperance and secrecy, the lodge has started a score of young men on the path of dissipation by the convivial and intemperate practices of its leading spirits.

Then, too, it ties good men up with bad men in such a way that they cannot if they would work to any purpose. It is an undisputed fact that many saloon-keepers and drinking men are Freemasons. Suppose this good brother had gone independently or as a member of a committee to a lodge brother engaged in the liquor business to call him to account for selling liquor to minors. His lodge brother would have taunted him with the fact that he set up the drinks for his brethren, and he would have had no moral power to resist his taunts and jeers, and if the case came into court he would require strong nerves to testify with any degree of assurance against one of his convivial comrades who had drank at his expense. The censorship and intimidation of the lodge would come with full force to deter the utterance of truth under such circumstances.

3. And this is one of the most dangerous features of the lodge. It inspires good men with such a dread of its vengeance that they shrink from an open, honest statement of the truth. The case of this friend in this respect is not unlike many others of frequent occurrence. The instances are rare where men who have once been connected with the lodge, have ever become entirely emancipated so as to speak and act as freely as they otherwise would. They know that its a sham and a sin, but "as they are situated, presume it's not best for them to say much about it."

Now any society that intimidates a man so that he is not free to utter his convictions is a curse to the man and a curse to the community in which it exists. Freemasonry is just such an institution, as thousands are ready to testify, and the sooner its enslaved members repudiate its terrorism and break its slavish bonds the better. The work of emancipation is well begun and it remains for those who suffer under the galling yoke to assert their inalienable rights and it will then be complete. The experience of the man above alluded to should be a warning to our young men to avoid these unfruitful works of darkness and a summons to all true men and women to reprove them.

—Bro. Starry reached Chicago from Yates City, Ill., on Saturday evening, and left for Grand Rapids and the Michigan State Convention Monday. He spoke three evenings in Yates City, and is satisfied that much was accomplished for the cause. Bro. W. B. Stoddard, who assisted him, has gone to Peoria to canvass for the Cynosure.

—Bro. Stoddard is attending the Michigan meeting this week, after a few days with us in the office after returning from Indiana.

—Joseph Cook, the great Boston lecturer, is spending a fortnight in the vicinity of Chicago. Thousands are listening night after night to his eloquent and profound addresses.

—Word from Washington on Saturday says that the rooms of the N. C. A. building on 4½ Street had been fitted up and seated, and appointment given out for a Bible reading on the Sabbath. This is good news to follow that of last week. The Washington work must not lag.

—The Western Christian Advocate, regarding the celebration of Christmas and Easter as already an established fact in the religion of to-day, asks that Good Friday be also introduced. If these can be defended, then can the multitude of saints days, fasts and festivals of Rome, be observed with good conscience.

—Rev. Isaiah Faris, younger brother of Rev. D. S. Faris of Sparta, Ill., now located at Waukesha, Wis., is a member of the Iowa Presbytery, and attended its late meeting at Morning Sun, Iowa, and also the great debate. He called at the Cynosure going and returning, and expressed himself as much pleased with the probable outcome, though not able to remain till the close.

—The Kansas friends are in serious earnest and prove by their activity what faithful work Bro. Feemster has been doing among them during the past year. From Olathe Bro. Curtis writes: "We are having local meetings in our county in various townships. Bro. Worrell and others are engaged. The reform work goes forward in our county finely. Bro. Worrell is a host at anti-secret work. On Saturday and in the evening he made a very able effort. The impresions he made were good and will cut their way through."

—About the same time Bro. Dissette from the central part of northern Kansas sends for an assortment of books and tracts, and adds: "Things are getting hot here and we desire to make them hotter. Much depends upon the use of anti-secret literature. We have had to discussions within the last two weeks in Opera Hall, before large and orderly houses. Our next occurs on the 20th of the month." Let the brethren rejoice that men are quetioning and investigating. Every agitation of the subject is like mud at the bottom of a stream, every time it is stirred up it is swept down toward the sea.

—Bro. M. N. Butler, State Lecturer for Missouri, visited Clarence, Iowa, during the last of March, and spoke Saturday evening, March 24th, on "Masonic Government," in the St. John United Brethren church. On Monday evening following he spoke in Dayton chapel, Wesleyan, on the American platform, and followed with another lecture in the same place next evening. Wednesday evening Clarence Opera Hall was opened for an address. He found warm friends in Elder Rathbun, Hon. J. M. Kent, brethren Starry, Powell, Furguson and others. He visited Cedar Rapids, Fairfield, Bedford and other points briefly on his return to Albany, Mo.

—A brother writes inquiring about the reliability of the advertisements in the Cynosure. Now, if we are asked to endorse editorially all the advertisements that may appear it will be equivalent to sampling the contents of an ordinary drug store. We cannot undertake it. Readers must use ordinary caution in accepting, as the business management of the paper does in publishing all advertisements. The unreliable and immoral are rejected so far as possible. We have known commodities advertised at so cheap a rate that the proprietors seemed almost to pay a premium for patronage; yet they were probably worth the small price asked. But in buying cheap stuff, though at low price, most people are usually disappointed. The rule is in ordinary deal (there are some exceptions) that a fair price has to be paid for a fair article. We shall endeavor to guard the columns of the Cynosure from all matter that lead its patrons into a fraud.

—Bro. Spooner of the Nebraska State Association is very urgent that all the friends of our reform in that State should make a special effort to be present. Reorganization is needed, and active work should now begin. Nebraska has enough warm-hearted, earnest and efficient workers to sustain a vigorous association and canvass a large portion of the State with lecturers. The State is comparatively new and society is in a formative condition. "An ounce of prevention" now will check or hinder entirely the organization of many lodges, which, once having funds invested in property, will die hard and fight long for life. Economy dictates an aggressive and liberal policy at this juncture.

A WORD ABOUT WASHINGTON.

A few persons have promptly forwarded their offerings in aid of the Washington enterprise, but the danger is that some will delay too long. I am led to emphasize this danger by the fact that the N. C. A. is being called to defend a claim of over $1,500 in the courts, involving much expense and trouble. The will of the deceased is definite and as strong as the best legal advice could make it, and no one questions the maker's intentions, but the interests of the Association depends not upon the wishes of the deceased, as it stands unquestioned by any one, but upon the decision of the court. Had the brother acted promptly all this trouble would have been avoided and his wishes carried out. The case has no special peculiarities about it and is liable to be repeated in other instances and the only sure way to avoid such difficulties is to become your own executor, a course which is both economic and Christian. The amount required to establish head quarters in Washington is not large, and would not be burdensome to any one if all who are interested take hold and work together.

I have been thinking that a division by States might simplify and facilitate the work of raising this fund. Suppose we put it: Rhode Island, $50; Maine, $50; New Hampshire, $50; Vermont, $50; Connecticut, $100; Kansas, $100; Missouri, $200; Wisconsin, $250; Maryland, $250; Pennsylvania, $500; Massachusetts, $500; New York, $500; Ohio, $500; Indiana, $500; Michigan, $500; Iowa, $500; Illinois, $1,500; District of Columbia, $1,500; Scattering, $150; Total, $8,000. Since we began in this enterprise our opponents have invested $17,000 purchase money on property in the same locality, which they are improving, and it will be no trifling task to hold our ground against them; but by united effort and in the name of our blessed Redeemer it can be done; and shall we do it?

LODGEDOM.

—Ohio is reported to have one Mason for every 110 of her population; Iowa one for every 88.

—The Cincinnati Times Star says in its lodge department the number of Masons suspended, expelled, etc., in the United States, aggregated in the past year nearly 25,000. "What will the harvest be," Sovereign Grand Inspector Drummond?

—The colored Knight Templar Freemasons of Missouri are worthy of recognition by Albert Pike himself. They observed the traditional "Ascension day."

—The Grand Master of Connecticut says: "Masonry sadly needs a higher standard of moral action." But what higher standard can be got out of the jumble of Christianity, Mohammedanism, Confucianism, Brahminism, paganism, deism, etc., which forms the religion of Masonry. Can the G. A. O. T. U. supply a better code?

—The only commanderies of Knight Templar in Chicago which have signified their intention of making the pilgrimage to San Francisco at the time of the Triennial Conclave are Apollo and St. Bernard. Both commanderies have decided to go by special car. Will the W. C. T. Union see that the members have an opportunity to sign the temperance pledge before they start?

—The Washington correspondent of the Boston Journal (Ben Perley Poore?) notes that Washington Masons held their feast of the "Paschal Lamb" on "Maunday Thursday," March 22nd, and remarks particularly upon the presence of Albert Pike "in magnificent health for a man over 73 years of age."

—Albert Pike is now visiting the Scottish Rite lodges on the Pacific coast in his capacity as Sovereign Grand Commander of the "Mother Council of the World, Sovereign Grand Inspectors General."

—An investigation of the lodge statistics in Cedar county, Iowa, show that during the two years from 1880–1882 the Masonic order lost thirty-three members, nearly every lodge coming in for a share. A similar state of demoralization is hoped for in Jefferson county in the same State.

—The religious question has come to the front in the Order of United Workmen. A prominent member of the society at Erie, Pa., who has avowed atheistic views, contrary to the ritual of the order, has been arraigned, and is threatened with expulsion.

—Two prominent Chicago lodges of Freemasons have lately held grand balls, one of them was dubbed a "charity" ball since the net proceeds were advertised for the flood sufferers. Doubtless the piety of the object atoned for the lax morality of the means.

—The Inter Ocean lodge editor finds that after nearly three years the big wounds made by the Chicago Conclave fiasco are unhealed. By this time they must be a foul-smelling sore which none of the lodge oaths can bind up nor lodge philosophy mollify and heal. He is compelled to say: "The position of Apollo Commandery relative to making the pilgrimage to San Francisco, next August, has given rise to remarks which rake up the unpleasant occurrences of the Chicago conclave, and which are better by far forgotten. As is well known, Apollo Commandery is contemplating a trip to Europe, and gives reasons for not going to California which are anything but complimentary to the California Sir Knights. On the other hand there are members of the order in this city who say that Apollo Commandery is in a measure to blame for any ill feeling that may exist, and if their statements be true there is not much to the credit of Apollo Commandery."

—At the annual "inspection" of St. Bernard Commandery of Knight Templar Masons in this city the following topics were among the speeches after the banquet: "The Moral Influence of the Order," by T. T. Gurney, "Past Grand Commander;" an apt selection, since Gurney as second highest officer in the city government may know how the municipality has come under the universal condemnation of churches, press and good citizens for its foul alliance with immorality of every kind. The celebrated Dr. Thomas also responded to the theme "Our Trust in one Another," most appropriate for a preacher of a Masonic Gospel which make reliance in a Redeemer from heaven altogether needless. It will be noticed that this is an improvement upon the answer put in the mouth of an Entered Apprentice who must say his trust is "in God."

LITERARY.

Cæsar's Commentaries are among the first of Latin books placed in the hand of a young student. Often coming to the study with little knowledge of the geography of the districts described, and less of cotemporary history, much of the charm and value of these writings of the Roman conqueror are lost. Trollope's little work upon the character of Cæsar and the wars he fought in Gaul, Spain, Italy and Egypt is an admirable reproduction of the Latin work for the benefit of English readers who cannot read that ancient language. Every one who has ever begun the translation of the original will take up this book with delight. John B. Alden, 18 Vesey St., New York, publishes it among his other books now celebrated for their low price, for 15c. in paper and 30c. cloth.

The Faith Missionary for the second quarter is unusually full and entertaining in its correspondence and news from missionaries in Ellichpoor and other parts of India, from west Africa, Bulgaria and New Orleans show that evangelization maintained by drafts upon the bank of heaven is gloriously prospering. Dea. O. M. Brown, of Oberlin, O., publishes this magazine and forwards any funds contributed to faith missions.

Good Literature has lately given its readers, among other good things, "Rosetti and the Religion of Beauty," "Pictures of Parish,", "School days of Gladstone," "Concerning the Unknown Public," "Sculpture and Modeling," and "The Camorra." Though these subjects represent a class of literature that is somewhat above our popular American taste, this paper shows evidences of a large constituency. Its reviews are just without being elaborate.

The Origin of the Stars and Stripes is a handsome and valuable plate sent out by the New York Life Insurance Co. of New York, and representing, from the genealogy of the Washington family, how the colors and heraldic combinations of the American flag came to be adopted. An explanatory pamphlet accompanies the chart which presents two brass memorial tablets of the 16th and 17th centuries.

The New Orleans Times-Democrat Almanac is very fully illustrated and contains valuable statistics respecting the departments of the general government, U. S. Courts, elections, Congress, population of States and cities, Postal tables, etc. The tables of Southern statistics are especially full. Price 25c.

Vick's Monthly for April gives a well pictured description of a vine trellis. Posts five or six feet high are set at proper distances, a cross board nailed at the top along which three wires are strung like a telegraph. The grape vines are trained upon these wires. The system presents many advantages.

The first letter in the new department of "Open Letters," begun in the May Century, will be "On the late Dr. Leonard Bacon and the Abolitionists," from the pen of Oliver Johnson, who takes serious exception to the statements made by Dr. Leonard Woolsey Bacon in the recent biographical sketch of his father.

—Thurlow Weed's autobiography has been sent to the printers, and will be pushed as rapidly as possible. It has been reported that the work would consist of two volumes, when in fact there will be but one. The book has been in course of preparation since 1843, and its entire contents were dictated to Miss Harriet A. Weed, who has had full charge of it, and it is edited by her alone. In the work of arranging the subject-matter she has been assisted, more or less, by the Hon. Frederick A. Seward, but the main work was performed by Miss Weed herself. She always acted as her father's amanuensis, and those who are aware how greatly Mr. Weed relied upon her will rejoice to know that Miss Weed determined to finish the work unaided.

—Secretary Teller has lately appointed Mrs. Helen Hunt Jackson, of Colorado Springs, the well-known poet and authoress, "H. H.," as a special agent of the Interior Department, to examine into the causes of complaint which have been made about the management of the Indians of Southern California. Mrs. Jackson is a vigorous writer on Indian topics, and during the administration of Secretary Schurz kept up a literary bombardment of the Indian Bureau because of the wrongful treatment of the Cheyennes, the Poncas, and some other tribes. It is understood that she wrote Secretary Teller regarding the mismanagement of the Southern California tribes, and he responded immediately by giving her official authority to make a thorough investigation.

The Home.

MY FATHER'S BUSINESS.

The waiting field is large and white,
And doth the sickle keen invite;
Yea, many drooping plants I see,
My Father's work is pressing me.

The reapers in the field are few
With willing hearts, and brave, and true;
Help must he summoned speedily;
My Father's work is pressing me.

The sickles rough and dull with rust,
Lie careless, trodden in the dust;
Sharpened and furbished must they he;
My Father's work is pressing me.

Let not the ripened grain he lost;
Before the winter's sleet and frost
It must he garnered faithfully;
My Father's work is pressing me.

From "The Rejected King," by Rev. W. T. Sleeper.

AVOID LIGHTNESS.

A eheerful happy spirit beeomes the sons and daughters of the Almighty, but a light and trifling spirit befits none but a buffoon. God says, in deseribing the deportment that "beeometh saints—Neither filthiness, nor foolish talking, nor jesting, whieh is not eonvenient." And again he commands, "Let your speech be always with graee; seasoned with salt." And yet again: "Let no eorrupt eommunieation proceed out of your mouth, but that whieh is good to the use of edifying, that it may minister graee to the hearers." And our Lord Jesus Christ has taught us: "That every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an aeeount thereof in the day of Judgment; for by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned." Remember it is written: "If any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able to bridle the whole body."

Frivolous, foolish talking and jesting are wholly inconsistent with the spirit of Christ. And God wants his people to be peculiar in this, that they are separate from the world in their speeeh, as they also are in their heart and their life. Be watehful, beloved, let all "your speeeh be with grace, seasoned with salt." "The lips of the wise disperse knowledge; but the heart of the foolish doeth not so." We may well pray with the Psalmist: "Set a wateh, O Lord, before my mouth, and keep the door of my lips." "Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be aceeptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my Redeemer."—Sel.

THE SEVEN WONDERS OF THE WORLD

Joseph Cook enumerates the seven wonders of the modern world as follows:

The first is the speed of inter-eommunieation. Boston, Loudon, or any of the large cities of the world, is as near to the ends of the earth as Rome was to the borders of its empire.

The seeond great wonder is the self-reformation of the hermit nations. Japan has made changes greater than any other nation has made in twenty-five years, and reeeives missionaries cordially. Some of their pupils have been at the bottom of the reeent reformation in that empire. Japan is more largely under the influenee of Ameriea than any other eountry.

The third great wonder of the world is the rapid parallel advancement of edueation and democraey all over the world, and the fourth is the world-wide unity of eivilization. If he could see the thing he most desired, it would be a league, not a union, of the English-speaking nations. He would have eonventions held for the eodifieation of international law. By an alliance, difficulties would be settled by arbitration, and not by war. It will be the duty of Christians to lay their hands on the throat of any power hostile to peace and break its neek.

The fifth of the modern wonders of the world is the triumph of Christianity. In the first 1,500 years of Christianity it gained 100,000,000 of people as adherents. In the next 300 years it gained 100,000,000. In the next eighty-two (the present century) it has gained 210,000,000. These people are eommunicants in the chureh. At the opening of this century the United States had one in fifteen in its free ehurches. Now it has one in five. The Bible is fast beeoming the eonstitution of the advaneed nations. A eommunity of text-books is approaehing.

Sixth, in the wonders of the world, is the current fulfilment of Biblieal propheey. Whatever be said of the Book of Daniel, it was not written after the beginning of Christianity, and it outlines the history of Christianity. Soon will the lights of Christian ships and the bells of Christian churehes be within sight and hearing of eaeh other around the whole world.

The seventh and most marvellous wonder of the world is the establishment on a sure basis of a scientifie supernaturalism. It is a thing settled by the best authority of mieroseopists, physiologists and ehemists, that the origin of life is not explained by the molecular theory of physies. A theory of evolution may be proved, but the theory as held by materialistie agnosties, has been already abandoned. Nine out of ten of the best scientifie men are theists, and utterly opposed to agnostic atheism. The tendeney of seience is not now away from Christianity.

IN-DOOR NOTES.

A WELL-KEPT KITCHEN.

Unless your scraps are to be saved for a cow or a pig, burn all leavings and parings, the refuse from tables, and the scrapings as fast as made. Open all the back drafts of the stove, put the leavings on the live coals, and let them dry and burn, which they will do in a few minutes. With the drafts open, there will be neither smell nor smoke. If the scraps must be saved, have a waste pail with a tight cover, or a covered firkin large enough to empty a panful of parings into it in a hurry without dropping any on the floor. Never pour slops with the waste, for it sours and ferments sooner. Have the pail emptied twice a day in warm weather, and scrubbed with water and a few turns of an old broom which cleans it without touching your hands to it. But if rinsed, drained, and dried in the sun, even your waste pail will be as neat, wholesome and well-kept as any of your belongings. Every wash-day, all slop pails and barrels should be scrubbed with hot suds and a broom outside and in, scalded and aired, then I think you will not have to shrink from them as disagreeable subjects. Kitchen furnishing shops supply large tight garbage firkins, neatly painted, with covers, which never need be obnoxious to sight or smell. A sour waste barrel in a corner, always foul with droppings, is not to be tolerated, for it is enough to cause fever in warm weather. You must not consider it beneath you to look after such details of house and yard, to see that everything in sight or out of sight is wholesome, clean, and safe as it is possible to be.

You have been taught to despise the slovenliness which wears a good dress and bright ribbons with unwashed skin and careless underclothing; learn also to despise and dread the housekeeping which is satisfied with pretty parlor aud chambers, while the closets are unswept and musty, and the back sheds and cellar full of half-decayed rubbish. Dread it, because such neglect causes ill-health. Do not rest till your working part of the house is as pleasant as the well-furnished part. Of all rooms in the house, I delight in a well-kept kitchen, for no other room is so given up to good works and consumate cleanliness, so washed and scoured and polished, till it smells of the sanctity of neatness. When the western sun shone broad and merry over the sparkling window, yellow floor, and white tables, when a savor of sweet marjoran and lavender from the window boxes was in the air, and the shining stove with its bright teakettle and simmering pans was a shrine of good cheer, I have taken portfollo and books out in my kitchen to the light stand and little shaker chair to enjoy the sparkling humor, and warm home radiance, the neatness and seemliuess, which made the place akin to poetry and clear thoughts.—The Next Neighbor, in April Wide Awake.

CONCERNING STARCH.

W. E. Stone writes upon Starch in the American Agriculturist for April:

Starch is composed of the elements, carbon, hydrogen, and oxygen. If we heat it gently with very dilute sulphuric acid it is dissolved, and changed into dextrine and glucose. This is substantially the process followed in the manufacture of glucose syrups. This change into sugar goes on in every plant in the growing season, and directly or indirectly, we may regard starch as the source of all vegetable sugar.

Starch is a valuable form of food for the plant, and is especially valuable as a reserve material. Observation shows that this is the very purpose for which it is intended, namely: to be stored up in large quantities and remain intact until such time as the plant is to make some unusual effort, as the maturing of the seed or wood, or the putting forth of foliage in the spring, when, by the ordinary vital processes, it would be unable to supply food as fast as it is needed. This office of starch is especially important the spring time. As long as the foliage remains green and healthy, the plant is able to prepare the food required for daily growth, but when this foliage is lost, as in autumn, the vital activity ceases and is dependent for its renewal upon the appeerance of foliage. But this latter process would be impossible without the previous storage of food, and to provide against this emergency, every plant stores up large quantities of starch in the growing season, which, with the opening of spring, is dissolved, converted into dextrine and sugar, as we see in the sugar maple, and feeds the rapid growth which all vegetation accomplishes at that season of the year. We obscrve this provision for the nourishment of the young plant in the storage of starch in seeds, bulbs, tubers and roots.

Everywhere we find starch performing the office of nutrition, and it may properly be regarded as the most important and abundant form of prepared plaut food. This, in connection with its relation to the food of man, places it among the most indispensable of vegetable products.

OUR BOYS AND GIRLS.

"IS IT YOU?"

There is a child, a hoy or girl—
I'm sorry it is true—
Who doesn't mind when spoken to;
Is it you? It can't be you!

I know a child, a hoy or girl—
I'm loth to say I do—
Who struck a little playmate child:
I hope that wasn't you!

I know a child, a hoy or girl—
I hope that such are few—
Who told a lie; yes, told a lie!
It cannot he 'twas you!

There is a hoy; I know a hoy—
I cannot love him though—
Who rohs the little birdie's nest:
That had hoy can't be you!

A girl there is, a girl I know—
And I could love her, too,
But that she is so proud and vain:
That surely isn't you! —Selected,

GLASS.

"Well?" A whole day had passed, but this question showed that Uncle Harrison had not forgotten the search he left his daughter, and their cousin so deeply interested in.

"I am ready to be enlightened, Lucy. What have you learned?"

"Why, father, I find that the word glass is derived from the Latin glacis, meaning ice, which it resembles in transparency. The oldest specimens are Egyptian. In the oldest tombs are found bottles, beads, vases and lamps of glass, more than four thousand years old. On the tombs built 1,800 years before Christ are sculptured the processes of its mnnufacture. They sometimes place their mummies in glass coffins, and history tells us that the body of Alexander the Great was shown Augustus in a glass coffin. They imitated the precious stones with marvelous success."

"Glass articles have beeu dug from the mounds of Assyria and Babylon; and do you remember bringing home once a very little picture of a bouquet which you said had been made by laying different colored threads of paints side by side so as to form the design, which were then pressed into a solid column, from which this picture had been sliced, as you'd slice a round loaf or a Bologna sausage?" "Yes. Why?"

"Well, the Egyptians did that same thing with glass more than 3,000 years ago; and then they knew how to color it by using the same things we use now—nomely, copper, iron, gold, tin, cobalt, and manganese, and indeed the perfectly clear glass was not made at all until about 750 years before Christ. The glass vases having their foundation of one color, overlaid with glass of another color, and figures and inscriptions cut through, giving historical scenes or religious rites, and different inscriptions, which have been found at Rome and Pompeii, must be very beautiful, and we know that in beauty nothing equals the forms of the vases and urns."

"Why, Lucy, who'd have thought our visit to the glass-works would have roused such an enthusiastic description of art in glass-working. Can you tell how it was discovered?"

"As this is a disputed point, father, perhaps you had better tell us," said Lucy.

"It is supposed not to have been invented at all, then"—

"How?" "What!"

"The knowledge came by accident."

"Tell us, papa; don't tease so."

"It is said that some merchants of Phœnicia, about the year 2000, were returning home with their ship laden with natron or soda. A storm overtook them, and they landed on a sandy tract under Mount Carmel, near Sidon. (The old navigators, although quite plucky, always landed when caught in a storm, if they could find a place to land at.) They had to eat or die, for that is the law everywhere; so they took some of the lumps of soda and built a fire-place, which held their cooking pots; then made the fire. The heat melted or fused the soda and sand, and so formed the first glass, which they beheld with astonishment. Some thoughtful mind took this small clue and followed it up, till centuries of experiment made the skilled laborers Lucy delights so in. So you see the application of it was the inventor's work, but the discovery was accidental."

"Are only sand and soda required, uncle?"

"Yes, that is, only silax and alkalies. Sand contains the silax—the Latin name for flint; and the alkalies are soda, lime or potash, and they always use a certain quantity of old glass. The heat that would melt flint and glass must be something tremendous, and the pots they melt in must be fire proof indeed. The pots are made of clay, which must be free from iron or lime, and made with the greatest care, a few inches only at a time. The men who do this work are called potters."

"Is the ordinary sand the kind used, papa?"

"No, it is a very white sand, found in abundance on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, especially at Alexandria and Sidon; pits of it are found in England and Germany, and some have been discovered in Australia and America."

"The moulding, grinding, polishing, painting, coloring, and making of glasses for optical instruments, such as telescopes, are very well worth learning about some other time."

"Yes, papa, some other time; we'll remember."—Selected.

BAND OF HOPE BIBLE LESSON.

ALL PERSONS ARE EITHER FOR THE TRUE RELIGION OR THE FALSE.

GOLDEN TEXT.—He that is not with me is against me. Matt. 12: 30.

Ques. 1. What is the subject of this lesson?

2. Repeat the Golden Text.

3. Show its application in the story of Cain and Abel. Gen. 4: 3–17.

4. Did they both believe in a God? Ans. They did, for they both brought offerings.

5. Then why were not both accepted? Heb. 11: 4. Ans. Abel offered in faith, by bringing a lamb of the the flock which pointed to Christ the Lamb of God. Cain in his offering did not acknowledge Christ or the need of pardon.

6. Then what is the great dividing line between a true and a false religion? Ans. One accepts Christ as the only Saviour; the other rejects him.

7. What is one reason why so many people want to be neutral—neither for Christ nor against him? Ans. because they are afraid of being reproached and called singular and fanatical by the world?

8. Is this noble or manly?

9. What did faith in a coming Christ lead Moses to do? Heb. 11: 24.

10. What shows that he had no fear of the world? Heb. 11: 25. Ans. He made a deliberate choice to leave all the honors and luxuries of Pharaoh's Court and cast in his lot with God's people though they were then a nation of slaves.

16. Can we please God without faith in his son? Heb. 11: 6, l. c.

17. If we worhip God but neglect and despise his Son, how does God receive our worship? John 5: 23.

18. What are the practical truths taught in this lesson?

That faith in Christ is the dividing line between true and false religion.

That everybody either refuses or accepts Christ, and therefore everybody is for the true religion or the false- There can be no neutral ground.

That to be afraid to take sides with right is mean and cowardly.

That God is not pleased with any worship that rejects his Son.

LESSON STORY.

Theodosius, one of the first Christian Emperors of Rome was once taught in a very striking manner the last practical truth contained in our lesson. Wishing to associate his eldest sou Arcadius with him in the imperial rule he conferred on him the title of Augustus, and had him sit beside him on his throne to receive the homage of the people. But when Amphilochius, Bishop of Icenium approached with the rest for this purpose he bowed with great reverence before the Emperor while he accosted the prince familiarly. The monarch naturally offended at the Bishop's conduct gave orders that he should be thrust from his presence; but when the guards were about to obey his command the good Bishop exclaimed: "Such is the treatment, O Emperor, which the King of Heaven has prepared for those impious men who affect to worship the Father but refuse to acknowledge the co-equal dignity of his Divine Son!"

It is said this reply so struck the Emperor, who perceived at once that the action of the bishop was a parable by which he meant to teach him one of the most important truths of the Gospel, that he ordered his instant release and never forgot the lesson.

A WOLF'S DISLIKE FOR MUSIC.

It is well known that, domestic dogs dislike music, but the hatred of it seems to be much stronger in a wolf. Dogs become familiar with it, and have learned to endure it; but to the wolf it is intolerable. It would be well for those who live in countries infested by wolves to arm themselves with some loud sounding musical instrument, as the following anecdote would suggest.

A Scotch bagpiper was travelling in Ireland, when he encountered a wolf, which seemed to be very ravenous. The poor man could think of no other way to save his life than to open his wallet and try the effect of hospitality. He did so, and the savage beast swallowed all that was thrown to him with such voracity that it seemed as if his appetite was not in the least degree satisfied.

The whole stock of provision was, of course, soon spent, and now the man's only resourse was in the virtues of his bagpipe. This the monster no sooner heard than he took to the mountains as suddenly as he had left them, The poor piper did not wholly enjoy his deliverance, for, looking sadly at his empty wallet, he shook his fist at the departing animal, saying: "Ay! are these your tricks? Had I known your humor, you should have had your music before your supper."—Harper's Young People

NOTES.

"As Peter passed throughout all quarters." Visiting and encouraging the churches. A visitation of the more distant churches by the more prominent ministers of very great value. As the commander of an army, he went about inspecting the ranks (to see) which part was compact, which in good order, which required his presence.—Chrysostom.

"Which dwelt at Lydda." The Lud of the Old Testament, in the rich plain of Sharon in north-west Judea. Lydda was a city of considerable size, about a day's journey from Jerusalem. It was, previous to the fall of Jerusalem, A.D. 70, the seat of a very famous Jewish school. St. George, the patron saint of England, was a native of Lydda. In the Mahommedan tradition, the gate of this city will by the scene of the final combat between Christ and antichrist. It was ruined in the Jewis hwar, but was subsequently rebuilt by the Romans, when it received the name of Diospolis, "City of Zeus" (Jupiter).—Schaff.

"Jesus Christ maketh thee whole." Or, literally, Jesus, the Messiah, healeth thee. It may be on account of humility and piety of this man that God permitted this miracle to be wrought upon him, but chiefly to call the attention of the inhabitants of this vicinity to the preaching of Peter, and to serve as a confirmation of the truths he uttered. Observe the care with which Peter guards against the miraculous power being attributed to himself, —Jesus Christ maketh thee whole. Peter was only the instrument.—Pierce.

"All that dwelt at Lydda and Sarou saw him." Not saw the cure, but saw him after he was cured, as in chap. 3: 9, 10, and John 9, 8. Saron (or Sharon) was the district in which Lydda stood. It was a plain exteuding about thirty miles along the coast from Joppa to Cæsarea. Luke's meaning is that the inhabitants not only of Lydda, but of the plain generally, heard and believed.—Abbott.

"Was full of good works aud alms-deeds which she did." We gather from this brief notice of the life of Dorcas, and from many other incidental allusions in the Acts and Epistles, that the life—recommended by the earliest preachers of Christianity, and certainly led by all the most distinguished members of the society—was eminently a practical and active existence. The disciples seem to have lived, as aforetime, in the world and among men and women; they mixed in the business and harmless pleasures, are shared in the social intercourse of the day: but at the same time they colored the old life with a new, strange beauty, they adorned it with acts of generosity, self-denying love, with sweet, gentle deeds of kindness done to slaves, to helpless ones, to poor sick beings of whose existence the busy, restless world had hitherto taken no thought.—Schaff. Good works can be justly regarded as genuine and Christian in their nature only when the whole soul of the individual who performs them is infused into them, so that it is not the hand alone, but the soul also, that gives and performs; the external acts proceed from the heart.—Lange.

"They laid her iu an upper chamber." This implies some little delay in the usual rapidity of Eastern funerals. —Plumptre. Wordsworth calls attention to this accounnt of the dead Dorcas, being the third instance in this book of reference to the decencies of Christian burial. St. Chrysostom, he goes on to say, contrasts the quietness of this laying out of Dorcas with the great lametation over Stephen (chap. 8: 2). Death, the followers of Jesus had now learnt to regard with greater calmness and joy. See St. Paul's reproof of immoderate grief for the dead in his earliest Epistle (1 Thess. 4: 13–18).—Schaff.

"Shewing the coats and garments." Dorcas died regretted; she was worth regretting, she was worth being restored; she had not lived in vain, because she had not lived for herself. The end of life is not a thought, but an action,—actiou for others. But you, why should yon be regretted? Have you discovered spiritual truth, like Paul? Have you been brave and true in defending it, like Peter? or cheered desolate hearts by sympathy like Ananias? or visited the widows and the fatherless in their affliction, like Dorcas? If you have, your life will leave a trace behind which will not soon be effaced on earth. But if not, what is your worthless, self-absorbed existence good for, but to be swept away, and forgotten as soon as possible. You will leave no record of yourself on earth, except a date of birth, and a date of death, with an awfully significat blank between.—Robertson.

"And she opened her eyes." Who can imagine the surprise of Dorcas when called back again to life? For the sake of themselves, and of the poor, there was cause of rejoicing; and much more for such a confirmation of the Gospel. Yet to herself it was a matter of resignation, and of submission rather than of exultation, that she was called back to these scenes of vanity. But doubtless her remaining days were still more zealously spent in the service of her Saviour and her God. Thus was a richer treasure laid up for her in heaven, and she afterward returned to a more exceeding weight of glory thau that from which so astonishing a providence had recalled her for a season.—Dr. Doddridge.

"Simon a tanner." By the strict Jews, the occupation of tanners was regarded as unclean, and they were ordered to dwell apart. This conduct of Peter, then, in lodging with a tanner, proves that he was free from these scruples. The Jewish law, in its strictness, was gradually losing its hold ou him, and he was becoming prepared for the reception of the great truth,—the admission of the Gentiles, without circumcision, into the Church of Christ.—Gloag.

PROMPTINGS TO FURTHER STUDY.

Where, so far as the New Testament informs us, did Peter travel outside of Palestine? To what class of men was Peter chiefly an apostle? To what class of men, and in what parts of the earth dwelling, did he address himself by letter? What connection did Peter speak of between the resurrection of Jesus Christ and the hope of believers? What did Peter quote, when he declared the gospel which he preached, to be the word of the Lord which abideth forever? How did Peter advise his Jewish hearers to behave among the Gentiles?—Scholars Quarterly.

TEMPERANCE.

—The Massachusetts Supreme Court decides that saloons cannot evade the law prohibiting the sale of liquor upon premises within 400 feet of a school house by boarding up the principal entrance on the street near a school house, and making entrances from other streets. About 150 Boston dealers have done this.

—Francis Murphy, the famous temperance advocate, will soon return to Philadelphia, after an absence of nearly three years. His health is said to be badly broken. He is threatened with serious pulmonary complications, and has lately spent on that account much time in the Scottish Highlands, but without the hoped-for benefit.

—We can see no reason why the sale of dangerous weapons to children should not be put in the same category as that of poisons and intoxicating drinks, and render the vendor liable to punishment. The use of a pistol is to shoot human beings, and whoever buys or possesses one gets it for that ultimate use or else for none. It is quite clear, therefore, that such instruments are not proper toys for children.—Montreal Witness.

—A society has been organized in San Francisco to prosecute free of charge suits brought against saloon-keepers under what is kuown as the civil damage law, making retailers of liquor responsible for loss of time and damages suffered by their customers. The first case tried was successful, a wife securing $2,000 damages from a saloon-keeper, who, after being warned not to do it, sold liquor to her husband, who was an habitual drunkard.

—Illinois has at least one Democratic newspaper which is outspoken for prohibition, the Press and People, of Galesburg. "Not to prohibit the liquor traffic," it says editorially. "Is knowingly and intentionally to sanction the vilest form of murder, and that too while professedly making and administering laws for the suppression of murder."

THE CUMBERLAND PRESBYTERIANS.

The General Assembly of this denomination met at Huntsville, Ala., adopted a strong memorial against the vice of intemperance of which the following is the greater portion:

The experiment of regulating the making and vending of intoxicating drinks by ligislation has been tried until thinking men everywhere regard it as a mere farce, hence the call from almost every direction for prohibitory constitutions and laws. To many well meaning men this has looked like an impossibility, but the experiments and the success of late years have given encouragement to the friends of good society and of humanity, to address themselves in greater earnestness to the work with the inspiring hope of success at no very distant period. The appetite of men addicted to habitual drunkenness might seem likely to interpose the most formidable obstacle in the way of success, but observation has pointed rather to the moderate drinker, but most of all to the men who derive their gains from making and vending the poisonous stuff; They are ever on the alert, and their money, their influence and their ingenuity are at the command of this opposing interest. "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" was the cry when the means of gain to the craftsmen of Ephesus were about to be destroyed by the power of the gospel. But this craft cries out, "Revenue:" "School Fund;" "Education of the children;" and a thousand other false and hypocritical pretexts are arrayed when the suffering innocents of the land, in their anguish raise the cry, "Down with the liquor traffic!" A military commander, when congratulated by his friends on an occasion of victory replied, "We cannot afford many such victories. Its cost had over-run its profit." It is true we derive revenue, school fund, etc., from the liquor traffic, but such a revenue! A revenue which fills the land with wailing widows, sorrowing wives, ragged and neglected children, blighted hopes, blasted prospects; and directly or indirectly fills our jails, penitentiaries and alms-houses; burdens our criminal courts with untold expenses; and, worst of all, hurls numberless thousands annually to the drunkard's grave, and alas! we fear, to the drunkard's hell. Is there no remedy? Are we doomed as a nation to this sad state of things? We are gratified to say to you that there are encouraging indications. In various parts of our country there is a great uprising of the frieuds of temperance and good order looking to such amendments in State constitutions and the enactments of such laws as will prohibit the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating drinks as a beverage. Some States have already passed what are called prohibitory laws, and we are happy to be able to report that thus far it is working well. In some other States they have enacted what are called local option laws, which afford much relief in the premises and is a step in the right direction.

GOOD WORDS

FOR THE CYNOSURE FROM READERS, WRITERS, REFORM WORKERS AND COTEMPORARY PAPERS.

E. E. Flagg, author of "Holden With Cords:"—
"Everybody who reads the Cynosure seems to be delighted with its improved apperanee, and the general verdict seems to be "better and better."

Rev. C. A. S. Temple, Reading, Mass., an able contributor:—
"I am more and more pleased with the improvement in the Cynosure, and more and more interested in the great cause it so ably advocates. Above all, the thoroughly evangelical tone and spirit of the paper commends it to the respect and sympathy of every friend and lover of our common Zion."

D. D. Miller, Durham, Iowa:—
"God bless the Cynosure. I would be lost without it."

A. M. Paull, Providence, R. I.:—
"I like the Cynosure very much in its new dress and general appearance, and am especially pleased to learn of its transferance to the Publishing House. The last number I thought a little extra, and marked the sermon and sent it to my pastor, or rather, the pastor of the church where I attend, Rev. F. Edwin Brown. The editor's letters were exceedingly interesting."

J. W. Modlin, Albion, Iowa:—
"I am well pleased with the present face and make up of our paper." My club are all well pleased with the new arrangement and appearance of the Christian Cynosure."

Rev. E. J. Clemens, (seceded Mason), Clayville, N. Y.:—
"I love the Cynosure and the cause of the reform. I fairly devour the contents of the paper."

Rev. B. T. Roberts, editor of the Earnest Christian and General Superintendent of the Free Methodist church:—
"I am much pleased with the Cynosure under its new management. May its influence be multiplied a thousand fold."

J. P. Bartlett, Blackberry, Ill.:—
"I am glad the Cynosure has got into its new quarters."

Wallace Porter, Fairfield, Wis.:—
"I want the Cynosure. It is the paper I read."

S. Mummy, Dewitt, Iowa:—
"I can't do without the Cynosure, for it is a weekly and welcome visitor, and I endorse what it teaches."

Elder Solomon Knapp, Joliet, Ill.:—
"My table is full of papers. Among all the papers I take, in all that goes to make up a good paper of high moral tone, the Cynosure stands first, in my judgment."

M. N. Butler, State Lecturer for Missouri, in a public address:—"Recently the Association assumed the control and publication of its official organ, the Christian Cynosure, making it a journal of which we are all justly proud."

O. C. M. Bates, Constantine, Mich.:—
"I think the Christian Cynosure is one of the best papers now in circulation. I am pleased with its new style."

The Christian Instructor, Philadelphia.

The Cynosure—This salwart anti secret sheet, the official organ of the National Christian Association opposed to Secret Societies, of whatever name or color, seems to have found DeSoto's fountain of rejuvenation. Indeed it now appears with more brightness, vigor and beauty than it did in the days of its youth. For some reason we did not receive the January numbers of this valuable exchange. But two numbers for February are before us now, and we are much pleased with the greatly improved appearance of the paper. Like the Christian Intelligencer, Christian at Work, Christian Instructor and other first-class papers, the Cynosure has adopted wide columns, thus improving the appearance of the paper and adding to the convenience and comfort of its readers.

The Banner of Holiness, Bloomington, Ill.

The Christian Cynosure is among the most valued of our exchanges. It is the leading journal of anti-secrecy reform in this country; at least so far as we know. In its editorial management there is evinced a very high order or ability, of which the fact that the scholarly Jonathan Blanchard is editor would afford the highest assurance. The Cynosure comes to us in a very handsome new dress, and on account thereof is to be much admired, as well as prized. The publication office which is in Chicago, has been removed to No. 221 W. Madison street.

The United Presbyterian, Pittsburgh.

The improvement in the Christian Cynosure ought to help its circulation, and doubtless will do so, since its patrons will feel more at liberty to recommend it on its material as well as its moral merits. The indications of its prosperity are gratifying as furnishing evidence that the cause it champions is progressing.

Brethren at Work, Mt. Morris, Ill.

The Christian Cynosure, published at Chicago, comes to us in a neat, new dress this week. We congratulate the publishers on their success. The paper is doing a good work, and ought to be well patronized.

The Evangelical Repository, Pittsburgh.

The Christian Cynosure is greatly improved in appearance. Heretofore, while it was one of the best of our exchanges in regard to contents, its type and paper were not good. Its friends, and they are many, and the number is constantly increasing, will be greatly gratified by this new evidence of its prosperity. The paper is in every way worthy of wide circulation. We shall be glad to hear of it receiving new subscribers by the hundreds and the thousands.

The Banner of Truth, Baker, Mo.

The Christian Cynosure has moved into the Carpenter building, the headquarters of the National Christian Association. Where in its new quarters it has put on a new dress and is otherwise greatly improved. Its list of contributors for this year cannot be excelled by any other paper in the country.

THE CHURCHES.

—The Iowa Presbytery of the Reformed Presbyterian church was held in Morning Sun, Iowa, last week during the great debate on Freemasonry between Elder Rathbun and Rev. F. M. Evans.

—Rev. L. J. Crawford, editor of the News of Sandy Lake, Pa., has been seriously ill but is recovering. He is connected with the United Presbyterian church.

—Mr. Waldo Messaros, a Greek of considerable ability, has been occupying the pulpit of the North-western Presbyterian church of Philadelphia, for nearly a year.

—Rev. Joseph Travis, editor of the Free Methodist, was last week assisting in a revival meeting at Elgin, Ill.

—The quarter centennial memorial fund of the United Presbyterian church is growing remarkably. Seventy-six congregations have subscribed $175,000. In addition to this subscriptions are being made in some three hundred other congregations. From these it is anticipated that not less than $200,000 will be received. This will make the round sum of $375,000. No estimate is mabe in relation to the remaining congregations, which are more than 400 in number, but it is believed that a full half million will be secured. There are thirty-four subscriptions of $1,000 each and fifty are expected.

—The next General Conference of the Wesleyan Methodist connection is to be held in Syracuse in October. This is a quadrennial meeting.

—It has been decided to close the Presbyterian Theological Seminary, at Danville, Ky., at least temporarily, because of a lack of funds; its endowment not being sufficient to maintain even four professorships. The seminary was opened in 1853, and has instructed about 260 students, over 100 pursuing the full course.

—Prof. Robert Stewart, now engaged in the United Presbyterian Mission, writes: "We have all been about as busy as men could be during the present winter. Dr. Barr has still the burden of the seminary work on his hands—besides the work of editing the publications for the press. And this work will continue until he starts for home, about the middle of March. Mr. Martin has been at Zafarwal, Moarli, etc., itinerating, and there doubtless he will remain as long as itinerating lasts. In every direction he finds encouragement. It is wonderful how rapidly the gospel is spreading in that direction." The net increase in this India Mission for 1882 has been about 210.

—Prof. Stewart also writes of an important visit: "The Lieut. Governor of the Panjab—Sir Charles Aitchison, is now making a tour of inspection through the Province. He travels with a great train of followers, and his visits are considered wonderful events by the natives. Last Sabbath he spent at Zafarwal—his encampment being close beside the Mission premises, and when time for service came he worshipped with our little congregation there and left them a gift of about fifty rupees, about twenty-one dollars. No doubt he thought they sadly needed a church building. Sir Charles is a member of the Free Church of Scotland, and a good man, so it is said. I imagine that he looks on the leavening influence of the gospel in such obscure places as the hope of a regenerated political as well as social life."

—The New York World of the 9th has a very interesting item respecting the conversion and present standing of the well known showman, Dan Rice. The Indian Wigwam at Thirty-fifth street and Broadway, says the World, where the Doutney temperance meetings are held on Sunday evenings, was crowded to overflowing last night by the announcement that a temperance lecture would be delivered by Col. Dan Rice of circus fame. Mr. Rice was introduced by Mr. Doutney after several songs had been sung. His appearance in the front of the performing ring was the signal for prolonged applause. When it had ceased Mr. Rice announced that he was feeling rather nervous, and was in fact "rattled" at the sight of the sawdust ring again, for it made him feel as if he were deserting the temple of God for the tents of the wicked. He put his hearers in a merry mood, however, by telling them the story of his conversion at St. Louis by Moody and Sankey, the evangelists. They urged him to take a new departure and join the band, he said. The advice at first suggested to him the idea of a good speculation, and the combination of Moody, Sankey and Dan Rice would be invincible. He never regretted his step, however, and since he had given up whisky he had become a new man, physically and mentally. "Talk about your drunken men here," he said; "you never saw me. You have heard perhaps about people seeing snakes; I have seen anacoudas, grizzly bears, rhinoceroses and hippopotamuses; why, Pilot and Jumbo ain't a circumstance to what I saw." He advised every one who wished to become temperate to try a touch of the "jim-jams," and they would never touch a drop of liquor afterwards. In relating his experiences as a circus man and lecturer he frequently aroused the laughter of his auditors by amusing anecdotes.

—The Directors of Xenia Theological Seminary at their recent meeting unanimously nominated D. A. Wallace, D. D. LL.D., to fill the vacant professorship in that institution. Nine students graduated from the institution this year.

—Cuba has always been a place of great religious darkness, and seemed to present little if any opening for Christian work. It is hoped that the Government will soon allow some measures, at least, of religious freedom. Meanwhile, Senor Rodriguez has a Sunday-school of 226 scholars, and Mr. Atwood, the American Consul, has begun a Sunday-school which has sixty scholars at present. The natives crowd about the doors to listen.

—Arabi, the Egyptian general and leader, before leaving Cairo procured a set of books from the American United Presbyterian Mission, and placed three of his children and his sister-in-law in the school of the mission. They are daily and faithfully instructed in the Scriptures. In regard to the results of the recent war, the mission says, "It has opened up all the land for missionary work. The asperities and opposition of the Moslem population are greatly softened. Moslem children are much more largely now attending our schools."

—The evangelistic services of M. Pashkoff, the Russian Gospel preacher, have been interdicted by the Russian Government. It is stated that the well-known converts of Lord Radstock, led by M. Pashkoff and other members of the aristocratic circles of St Petersburg, will not be allowed to continue the Bible-classes and prayer-meetings any longer. The evangelist is held up to ridicule in several organs of the public press.

—The commission charged by the American Board at Portland, with investigating the complaints from Western Turkey, wrote to leading Armenian pastors and others in that field, requesting from each one a full and frank expression of his views; the object probably being to obtain all shades of opinion on the subject. But the executive committee of the Bythinia Union has printed a circular to the churches which points out that inconveniences are likely to arise from any promiscuous statement of views by individuals, and recommends that all parties wait until the spring session of the Bythinia Union. At that session an official statement, giving all necessary information will be drawn up and forwarded to the Investigating Commission, through Mr. S. M. Minasian.

REVIVAL IN OMAHA.

The evangelist, Ben Hogan, came to the city of Omaha but a few days ago; and the success which he has thus far had has surprised many; and it has practically surprised them because there had been so many attempts to revive the people and have an ingathering of souls without success. There are truly—in this city—many who have traveled the sinful road, the same as the evangelist did before he was converted; and the story of his experience and deliverance by God's grace awakens an interest and causes them to ask the question, "What shall I do to be saved?"

At the first meeting at the Opera House there was a large attendance, and at that time a deep interest was created, and has continued. The second meeting was in the Baptist church, where the various churches of the city were represented; and that church seems to be the place where the revival of this city is to commence.

It is true, that we need it and that we have prayed for it; and may it also be true that the revival will be exceedingly large. H.

Buddhism a Fraud.—Bishop Schereschewsky, the Epispocal Missionary Bishop of Shanghai, China, in a recent appeal for aid in his work cobmats the idea, that all religions have their claims, that Christianity is merely one of many religions, and that in Buddhism especially—the prevailing religion of Eastern Asia—there is so much that is good, so much that is identical with Christianity, that it were as well not to disturb this ancient religion—as perhaps those who entertain this feeling are apt to think it—and leave "well enough alone." "For more than twenty years," he says, "I have been a student of Buddhism, I have thoroughly studied the Buddhist books—which in themselves constitute a vast literature—I have talked with hundreds of Buddhist priests and monks Chinese, Mongolian and Thibetan, I have visited many Buddhist temples, I have even lived in such. Therefore laying aside all mock-modesty in a matter that so closely concerns the church, I feel competent to state that a more gigantic system of fraud, superstition and idolatry than Buddhism as it is now has seldom been inflicted by any false religion upon mankind. It is true that Buddhism is not devoid of teachings in which there is much that is good and noble. But as a religious system it is utterly ineffectual to mould or guide the souls or the bodies of men. I am prepared to prove as well—should circumstances so permit me—that Christianity antedates Buddhism, so far as we know of the latter from its literature. My own experience has convinced me that Confucianism is much to be preferred to Buddhism and whatever we find of good among the Chinese may be traced to the influence of Confucianism. And I believe that every intelligent missionary in China will bear me out in this assertion. In the meantime I content myself with saying that the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ alone is able to save us both in soul and in body, both individually and nationally."

EDUCATIONAL.

William and Mary College, of Virginia, the oldest educational institution in this country, has been compelled to close its doors because of poverty and lack of studeuts. There was a time when it stood side by side with Harvard in prominence and number of students, but the pride of Virgiuia in her educational advantages has been extinguished.

Senator-elect Randall Gibson, of Louisiana, has just returned from Princeton, N. J., where he conferred with Paul Tulane, the millionaire, who proposes to found a poor boys' college in New Orleans. Tulane has already placed $350,000 in the hands of a trustee for that purpose. But the fund has not as yet been exempted from State taxation, and Tulane proposes to withhold the remaiuing installments of his gift until the whole is so exempted. This will be done by the Louisiana Legislature when it meets again. This will not be until next year. Tulane's second installment will probably be equal to his first.

Ogontz, near Chelten Hills, on the North Pennsylvania Railroad, the former residence of Jay Cooke, is to be transformed into a private boarding-school for young ladies. For many months Mr. Cooke has had a large force of men at work making the alterations, in order to turn it into an elegant private seminary. He has spent $40-000 already in improvements, and intends to furnish the house anew at a cost of $25,000. Ogontz is situated on a knoll commanding a splendid view. The grounds comprise forty acres. The building is a five-story mica granite structure, of the Norman-Gothic order, There are one hundred rooms of comfortable size. Ogontz cost Mr. Cooke over a million of dollars. It was named after an old Indian chieftain, who used to carry Mr. Cooke upon his shoulders when a boy at Sandusky, O.

A revolt among the students at a Paris school called the Lycee Louis le Grand will occupy a conspicuous place in the history of accademic insurrections. It originated in the displeasure of the boys at the expulsion of one of their number, and before it was finally quelled a detachment of forty policemen, one of whom was seriously wounded, had to break open the dormitories behind whose barricaded doors the rebels had entrenched themselves. The pupils sent preposterous terms of surrender to their principal, who promptly declined the same, and therefore expelled and caused to be ejected no fewer than 270 of the refractory students.

The newspapers and periodicals of all kinds issued in the United States and Territorics now reach the imposing total of 11,196. This is an increase of 585 in twelve months. Taking the States one by one, the newspaper growth in some is very considerable. The present total in New York state, for instance, is 1,399—a gain of 80 in the past year. The increase in Pennsylvania is 48, the existing number being 943. Nebraska's total grew from 175 to 201, and Illinois, from 890 to 904. A year ago Massachusetts had 420 papers; now the uumber is 438. In Texas the new papers outnumbered the suspensions by 8, and Ohio now has 738 papers iustead of 692. The most remarkable change has occurred in the territories, in which the daily papers have grown from 43 to 63, and the weeklies from 169 to 243—Dakota being the chief area of activity. The number of monthlies throughout the country grew from 976 to 1,034, while the dailies leaped from 996 to 1,062. The figures given above are exclusive of Canada, which possesses a total of 606. It is interesting to note that the newly settled regions of the Canadian North-West are productive of newspapers as well as of wheat, for the number of journals issued in Manitoba was nearly doubled during the year.

—Not long since the ship Northern Light picked up at sea six South Sea Islanders from Abimana of the Gilbert Islands, and took them to Yokohama. The ship found them adrift and in a dying condition on November 10th in latitude 7 deg. 31 min. south, and longitude 168 deg. 1 min. east. The boat contained ten persons, five of whom had died from starvation. There was one woman among the survivors. They were so amaciated and looked so wretched, especially the woman, that at first their recovery was believed to be impossible. However, they received all possible care and all recovered. Their story was that in attempting to cross from one island to another a storm overtook them and drove them to sea and out of sight of land. They had nothing to eat but a little dry pulverized banana, and to drink, a few gallons of water in vessels. The woman gave birth to a child while on board the Northern Light, but the babe did not survive. One of the men speaks a little English. They are to be sent back from here to Australia, thence to the Fiji Islands and from there to the Gilbert Islands. To all outward appearances they are untutored savages, yet constant intercourse with them shows that they have been under missionary influence. Captain Slocum, of the Northern Light, said regarding them: "A more devout band of Christians I never met. When first hauled out of their cheerless cockle-shell, more dead than alive, they fell upon their knees on the deck and gave thanks to the Almighty with becoming reverence."

"HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

Thirty copies were mailed from this office last Monday of that valuable book "Holden with Cords." Hundreds of new recruits will become interested in the reform through this work of Miss Flagg. For sale at the N. C. A. office.

DR. JOHN BULL'S
Smith's Tonic Syrup
FEVER and AGUE
Or CHILLS and FEVER.
AND ALL MALARIAL DISEASES.

The proprietor of this celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. He refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to cure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and whole families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the geueral health. It is however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medicine will not require any aid to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

The genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN J. SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP, of Louisville, Ky. Examine well the label on each bottle. If my private stamp is not on each bottle do not purohase, or you will be deceived.

OUT DOOR WORK.

A GOLD VEIN ON MOST FARMS.

Very many communities know the excitement produced by the rumor, even, that somebody in the vieinity has found indications of the presence of gold in the soil. Untold millions have been expended in searching for the precious metal in loealities wherc a bit of useless iron pyrites (sulphide of iron) has been mistaken for gold, whieh resembles it in color. Our observation indicates that there is, on at least four-fifths of the farms of this country, an overlooked golden vein, of mueh greater value than any yellow metal likely to be found outside of a few special geologieal formations.

The following experiment tried on any farm or garden will explain what we are aiming at. Take a quart of fair quality yard manure, and pour upon it a pint of water. After standing a week or two drain off a half pint of the liquid. Now prepare two corn hills, a few feet apart, on any ground, even rieh prairie soil. For one hill make a hole three or four inches deep, and pour into it the half pint of liquid, adding a trifle of fine earth, and plant the corn. Plant the second hill without this preparation. The result will be, almost always, that in the first hill the rootlets, and subsequent roots, will grow downward where the liquid has soaked, much more quiekly, grow stronger, spread wider, and send out far more numerous feeding fibres than will be found in the second hill. The young corn plants (and the the same with other plants) will, like well fed young animals, develop much earlier and take far better advantage of the growing season. In short, whatever the soil, this hill will, on the average, ripen earlier, produce more stalks, and twenty to fifty per cent.—often a hundred per eent.—morc sound kernels than the other hill. And by the way, there is in the quart of fertilizer enough material left for a similar effect on three or four other coru hills.

Now, visit the farm-yards of the country generally, and in uine-tenths of them there will be found on one side or another, quarts, gallons, barrelfuls of this golden liquid leaching away and wasting—often scores and hundred of barrels a year. Yet, at a trifling eost, perhaps only an earth bank ou the lower side of the yard, all this wastage may be saved and turned to aeeount. The streams rich in stimulating plant food, now lost from the yards of the four and one-third million farms of our country, may, with very little care and trouble, be retaiued in the rotting organic matter, and transferred to corn hills and the roots of other crops. Real gold will be found in the increased crops, and be obtained at far less labor and cost than is expended by the great mass of miners. Proper attention to so simple a matter on the farms of the country, taken together, would add morc to the wealth of the country every year than is now dug out of all the mines betwcen the Atlantic and Pacifie. During the leisure month let every one look over his own premises, and see what he is wasting in this direction, and where he ean save and profit.—Sel.

WEATHER FACTS AND PROBABILITIES.

As we are passing through a period of very aecentuated and trying atmospheric changes, the following ten rules by the use of whieh a person can stand beneath his own vine and fig-tree in any part of the northern hemisphere north of latitude 15, and for hundreds of miles around him form an accurate opinion of how the wind and weather are progressing, may be of value:

1. When the temperature falls suddenly, therc is a storm forming south of you.
2. Wheu the temperature rises suddenly, there is a storm forming north of you.
3. The wind always blows from a region of fair weather toward a region where a storm is forming.
4. Cirrus clouds always move from a region where a storm is in progress towards a region of fair weather.
5. Cumulous clouds always move from a region of fair weather towards a region where a storm is forming.
6. When cirrus clouds are moving rapidly from the north or northwest, there will be rain in lcss than twenty-four hours, no matter how cold in may be.
7. When cirrus clouds are moving rapidly from the south or southwest, there will be a cold rain-storm on the morrow, if it be summer; and, if it be winter, there will be a snow storm.
8. The wind always blows in a circle around a storm, and when it blows from the north the heaviest rain is east of you; if it blows from the south the heaviest rain is west; if it blows from the east the heaviest rain is from the south; if it blows from the west the heaviest rain is north of you.
9. The wind never blows unless rain or snow is falling within 1,000 miles of you.
10. Whenever a heavy white frost oecurs, a storm is forming within 1,000 miles north or northwest of you.

Sex in Eggs.—A correspondent of the Londou Journal of Horticulture says inreferenee to this question: "Last winter an old poultry-keeper told me he could distinguish the sex in eggs. I laughed at him, and was none the less skeptieal when he told me the following secret: Eggs with the air-bladder in the eenter of the crown of the egg will produee cockerels; those with the air-bladder on one side will produce pullets. The old man was so certain of the truth of this dogma, and his poultry-yard so confirmed it, that I determined to make experiments on it this year. I have done so, carefully registering the egg-bladder in the center or on one side, rejecting every one which was not decidedly one or the other, as in some it is very slightly out of the center. The following is the result: Fifty-eight chickens were hatehed; three are dead, and eleven are yet too young to deeide upon their sex; of the remaining forty-four every one has turned out true to the old man's theory. This, of course, may be an accidental eoincidence, but I shall certainly try the experiment again."

A CRUCIAL TEST.

The severe chemical tests to which the various baking powders have from time to time becn placed have demonstrated clearly to the public the relative merits of the different brands from an analytical point of view. For instance, Dr. Love, the eminent Government Chemist, in his analyses, made the comparative strength as follows:

	Cubic Inches Gas evolved.
"Royal" (absolutely pure)	127.04
"Charm" (alum powder)	116.9
"Dr. Price's"	102.06
"Snow Flake" (Groff's)	101.88
"C. E. Andrews & Co's" (alum powder)	78.17

The Royal Baking Powder was found, besides being of absolute purity, to evolve the highest amount of leavening gas of any of the powders tested, and hence it was placed at the head of the list and recommended for Government use.

But the crucial test of the kitchen is, after all, the most satisfactory to the housekeeper. A baking powder that never fails to make light, sweet, wholesome and palatable bread, biscuit, cake, etc., upon all occasions, is one that will be placed at the head of the list by the practical housewife, and received into her kitchen for continuous use. This test the Royal Baking Powder has stood for over twenty years without a single failure, and hence its reputation as the best baking powder made has spread from house to house, until its use has become as universal as its merits are unrivaled.

The Facts Stated.
HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.
This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.
In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."
The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless the last historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

THE BATAVIA CONVENTION MINUTES.

A correspondent writing of the grand addresses in this pamphlet says:

"Let me call particular attention to the address of our noble banner-bearer, the candidate for the suffrages of the nation, under the title "Christian politics." This admirable and timely paper is one which will open blind eyes to the causes of the war and future dangers and ought not to be merely read and shelved. It is like LIVE SEED; Let every reader get and sow it abundantly, and scatter it abroad through every State, and for every year, until victory shall crown our efforts to place a representative of our principles in the Presidential chair of the United States! Print and reprint and circulate in tens of thousands or millions! Our people are intoxicated with national prosperity, and are disregarding "the higher law." In every age the multitude is led more by the senses than by the unseen, but the Ruler of the universe brings to naught things that are by the things that are not! The things that are right and pure are eternal, and in the grand war must finally overcome the cunning and craft of every system like Freemasonry.

A LESSON IN SPELLING.

Since the introduction of Spelling Matches, many words have come prominently into notice —words that were previously, comparatively unknown. For instance, we find Anti-septic, meaning: preventing and stopping all fermentation and decomposition, and Analgesia t: Painkiller. Then there is Anti-pyretic: cooling down inflamation and fever heat. These three words, so often mis-spelled, are three of the cardinal virtues of something that will cure many a bad spell, and that is Salicylica, pronounced Sal-i-cyl-i-ca. Warranted to afford immediate relief, and guaranteed to cure Rheumatism, Gout or Neuralgia.

SECRET!

THE ONLY DISSOLVER OF THE POISONOUS URIC ACID WHICH EXISTS IN THE BLOOD OF RHEUMATIC AND GOUTY PATIENTS.

SALICYLICA is known as a common sense remedy, because it strikes directly at the cause of Rheumatism, Gout and Neuralgia, while so many so-called specifies and supposed panaceas only treat locally the effects.

It has been conceded by eminent scientists that outward applications, such as rubbing with oils, ointments liniments, and soothing lotions will not eradicate these diseases which are the result of the poisoning of the blood with Urie Acid.

SALICYLICA works with marvelous effect on this acid, and so removes the disorder. It is now exclusively used by all celebrated physicians of America and Europe. Highest Medical Academy of Paris reports 95 per cent cures in three days

THE WEEK.

The Texas meteor hoax is a marked example of the ease with which the well-meaning young men who generally control the press dispatches and the columns of our dailies are made the agents of deception. The description of the fall of a small mountain out of the sky, an acre in size, which plunged 200 feet into the solid earth and left seventy feet projecting, should have been recognized immediately as a small edition of Baron Munchausen or Jules Verne. But hundreds of papers printed it with owlish gravity, and perhaps as little care for its truth as if it were only a lodge lie about a Washington funeral. In fact, sensation and a smack of enterprise for news are of as much account with too many of our secular papers as the care that truth only should be spoken at all times.

Joseph Cook, the great Boston lecturer, has drawn the fire of the daily press in a way that must be unpleasant to him, but will not detract from the esteem with which he is held by good men everywhere. To his speech before the Congregational Club here, reiterating some criticisms upon the management of the daily press made from the Boston platform, the papers reply by hinting in a very Masonic way at what they are pleased to call "his gross ignorance and inaccuracy on those matters of science with which he has undertaken to deal." They claim that the more "rational clergymen" are ashamed of him. They may be ashamed and confounded before him, for no American has so confounded and overthrown their rationalistic views. Decent men should rejoice that the vile pandering of our daily press to the basest instincts of base men can be rebuked by one who does not fear the abuse which they offer instead of reply, and whose opinion is respected so widely that it will effect their patronage. The Advance of this city has reproved the press of Chicago, especially the Tribune and Inter Ocean, for this lending of their columns to do the devil's work, and it is a satisfaction to know that it has been sustained in this course.

At the same meeting Mr. Cook was asked, among other questions which he invited, whether "secret combinations" do not threaten the welfare of our government. He replied promptly that while secret societies were not so much to be feared in our country, they were uncalled for entirely. In tyrannical governments there might be some excuse for them. They should be discouraged in proportion as they are self-seeking and cultivate a narrow spirit which recognizes no interest outside their own members. He abhorred the selfish, clannish spirit manifested by many of these organizations. This remark was received with cheers, and the Cynosure adds another.

The Knight Templar conclave business will not spread itself over quite so much surface next August as it did in 1880. Only about 3500 are reported as likely to be present even though a half-fare trip to the attractive scenery of California is put up as a premium for every faithful pilgrim knight who dutifully follows around as he is bid by his superiors. The great Apollo Commandery of this city, with its greater ex-commander Gassette, who flourished three years ago, and as general manager of the Chicago conclave covered himself with glory—this, the largest Commandery in the world, turns up an aristocratic nose at San Francisco and the conclave, and will start for Europe before many weeks. Gassette manages this piece of indignation and publishes at length the routes, the hotels, the resting places, K. T. lemonade stands, etc., etc., as none but Gassette could do. It is fortunate for the Freemasons that they have in their number a a man of spirit and enterprise who knows how to get back a stinging reply when the brethren of the craft attempt to find fault with him. This split in the military order of Masonry is worth observing to the end.

On Thursday a monument was unveiled in Washington city to the memory of Prof. Joseph Henry, late at the head of the Smithsonian Institute. An unusually large number of distinguished men were present, and Chief Justice Waite after a brief address drew away the canvas from the statue, which is said to be one of the finest that ornament the national capital. Noah Porter, president of Yale College, pronounced the oration and paid a willing and noble tribute to the man, who though a "priest of science" all his life was not led away by the speculative theories of English and German evolutionists. To this modest, unselfish Christian philosopher the world is indebted for its telegraphic system. In 1828 Prof. Henry invented the electro-magnet which is fundamental to that system, and in 1831, some years before Morse reduced the theory to practice, he published the idea of communication with distant places by means of magnetism. His life was spent in scientific research which has benefited the world, while he seemed to have no thought of pecuniary profit from his labor.

The Dakota emigration is a study. The pioneer who pushed out into Western New York, into Ohio, Illinois and Kansas, toiled through a long and anxious journey and expected one of the greatest privations of the new home to be the want of neighbors. His market was so far distant that himself and team would eat up the worth of a load of hogs or grain before he could get home, and for groceries and clothing much dependence must be had upon his own wits and the farm; while the railways were years in approaching the vicinity. All these conditions are reversed in the great Dakota movement. The locomotive is the pioneer. Two great railway lines have carried competition to such an extreme that they are first to cross the prairies, lay out villages and make the way for the settler. Instead of waiting until the business of the country was large enough to demand the railway, the system has outrun the legitimate growth of the country and the rules of trade, and has pushed out to make traffic for itself by making a country at wholesale. This would do very well if the companies that tempt settlers would see to it that they do not needlessly suffer by coming in such immense crowds as to exhaust supplies, contract diseases and perish helplessly. Such evils threaten the settlements in the Northwest. The glowing and well-paid reports in the daily papers, have overdone the business. No room is found for the settlers under roof, and their effects strew the prairie along the railroad lines. The necessary effect must be great suffering, and sore disappointment to thousands who have forsaken all for a new home, but find they have been chasing a mirage.

The threatening letter received by the foreman of the jury which sentenced the assassin Brady in Dublin had some effect upon others, though it did not swerve the steadfast juryman from his duty. When the case of Curley, the next conspirator was called, fifty persons failed to appear when summoned on the special jury panel, though they were aware that a fine of £100 would be imposed on each absentee. The trial of Curley proceeded, however, and his conviction and sentence followed. The trial of Kelly followed and on Friday was given to the jury, which failed to agree. In London another trial of almost equal interest is proceeding, of the men arrested as dynamite conspirators. One of these has also turned informer, and the publication of his testimony has thrown the extremists among the Irish agitators into a panic, so that each is anxious to be first to deny either sympathy or connection with the plot. Lynch says he was a member of a secret society in this country which was composed of other secret societies, as Fenians, Ancient Order of Hibernians, etc. He was bound to obey the orders of whatever superiors. He was sent to London to help blow up public buildings. He describes the place of meeting in New York and in England had dealings with persons on whose premises explosives were found. Much of his story is substantiated, but O'Donovan Rossa, who has been the boldest of England's enemies, boasting that his agents would destroy shipping, blow up buildings, and spread carnage, fire and death on every hand, denies every statement of the witness. The judicial inquiry will perhaps have the good effect to quiet this braggart, if it does not cause him more serious trouble.

IGNORING A GREAT DISTINCTION.

It is amazing, and would be amusing if it were not lamentable, to find men otherwise intelligent, so ready to defend Masonry as equal to, or identified with Christianity, when the means abound which would enable them to see that, so far from being identical or in harmony, they are thoroughly antagonistic and irreconcilable. For whenever the one becomes supreme, the other must be banished. There is no room in any heart or head, no room in any church or in any community, for two supreme rulers! The two are in perfect contrast. The one is open and free in reality, and aims to spread its blessings freely to every human being. The other is secret and free only in name, and aims to spread its system over only such men as are "perfect" in body and willing to blindly obey the secret oaths they must take, or be exposed to their awful penalties.

But there is an intermediate class. Men who profess to be neutral and philosophic; and who being consciously or unconsciously Masonized or non-Christian plausibly give forth their platitudes which are generally allowed to pass without question. They condemn nonsense in the rites and ceremonies of Masonry as well as in those of Christianity. They condemn crime whether done by Christians or Masons. If either would live up to their respective rules they would be good men. And even when such affairs as that of Morgan occur they find that his easy death was far more humane, than those inflicted by Christians when they persecuted and tortured their victims.

As if Christ had ever authorized persecution! As if torture could ever be justly ascribed to Christianity! Nay, nay. Such actions violated the law and spirit of Christ. But do they violate the laws and oaths of Masonry? Certainly not; for they constitute part and parcel of the system. Here then is a popular fallacy, and we tear off the glittering robe of mere pretense from the defenders of the Masonic system as being Christian, and there it stands revealed as a very subverter and antagonist of Christ and his kingdom.

But such men would really erect lodgery into a power which would rival not only Christianity but control the government of every nation and of every community, for it claims the first service of its devotees. And the fruits of such a system startled our own country half a century ago by the murder of Morgan, like an eruption of Vesuvius. At any future day we may expect from the same volcano another outburst of the smouldering fires of lodgery. We see the fruit of lodgery in the murders of the Emperor of Russia and of Burke and Cavendish and many more victims in Ireland. Even in our own hitherto free land we hear rumbling thunder among the lower strata of our population, whose murders by "unions," "Molly Maguires," etc., are too well known. Even our own lecturers and agents have occasionally had cracks open at their feet and smelt the sulphur of the hatred of lodgery.

It is a common but weak and false position for such philosophers to charge anti-lodge Christians with wilfully misrepresenting every Mason as wicked and every private institution as destitute of good. And they think they do a smart thing when they point to the sins of the Jews or of Christian professors as an offset to the evils of lodgery. As well might they charge the law of the land with the acts of criminals, or Christ with the crime of Judas! They would purify the Bible, forsooth, because it records crimes of men! Let them remember that even for the worst of men, there is mercy offered in the Bible. Evil as the acts of man are, the heart of every man epitomizes the tendencies of the race, and in Christ's Gospel we have the assurance that "He is able to save to the uttermost all who come to God by him." But what of those who come to God by Masonry? As well try to do so by the Tower of Babel, of which Masonry is a fit representative. How so? Because in Masonry every religion is tolerated, and the Babel tongues of Mohammed, and every other than Christ, every anti-Christ and every false Christ may be found, praising when apart, their own praphets but united when building up the tower or when singing the song,

"Hail Masonry divine,
Glory of ages shine.

No other Saviour than itself is required by Masonry. But the sinner who accepts Christ must abandon all else, for Jesus has said, "No man cometh to the Father but by me." And his apostle has proclaimed that "Neither is there salvation in any other." The civil government should vindicate itself, but from the religious standpoint we have a word more to the reader if he is a groper in the dark. Let him learn of the child the first grand lesson for our race, viz., trust or faith. As the child grows and trusts his parents so ought man to trust God. "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth," is the grand opening verse of the Bible. The mind is at rest here and man never dreams of claiming to be Creator. Then learn his message as revealed in Christ and the Scriptures which testify of him, and you will find the adaptation of heavenly truth for your heart, as assured as the adaptation of food to the support of life, as delightful as light to the eye, as sweet as honey to the taste or as songs of praise to the ear and the ear of the soul. It gives peace and joy even in the hour of departure from its mortal casket, and glories in the blessed hope of the body immortal "forever with the Lord."

LODGE FUNERALS.

The secret orders are great on funerals. Funerals give them an opportunity to show their tinsel and feathers to the boys and girls. They can never get enough of funerals, and so they often try to crowd themselves into somebody else's funeral, and so they are a perpetual annoyance to pastors and families who would like to bury their dead in a Christian way. Christian families, to whom the parade, music and mummery of the orders are offensive, ought not to have such things forced upon them, with the prospect of a rumpus and a riot if they refuse to accept them. If the birds of the lodge, always spoiling to show their gay plumage, could find a way of doing it without marring the solemnity of a funeral, it would be a great relief to many pastors, who are tempted to wish there might be one grand funeral for the burial of all secret societies, at which they would doubtless be willing to officiate, with or without music, and let the Prince of Darkness be chief mourner.

One thing the Christian public should insist upon, and the secret orders ought in decency, to accede: Professing Christians belonging to secret societies, and having charge of funerals, should have them wholly Christian or wholly after the ritual of their society. Let them wholly discard the Christian religion and its rites, and set the lodge and its rites in their place, or else let the funeral be a Christian one. This mixing of heathenism and Christianity is an outrage on such as prefer the Christian way, and if the heathen way is to be followed at all, let it be followed wholly; let the dead be taken to the lodge, and the coffin be decorated with lambskins and regalia; let there be no Christ or Scripture there, but let the lodge's chaplain, not a Christian minister, read its ritual, and let drum, fife and horns, and not hymns and psalms, pour forth their inspiring strains. It is time that this laying hands on the Christian dead, to show off the superior way with which the lodge does such things, was discontinued.

PRESS ONWARD.

BY W. BOURNE.

Onward! will ye stop and ponder,
While the minutes pass ye by?
Will ye 'mid your dreamings wander,
While the hours just breathe and die?

He whose ardor brightly burneth
With a purpose true and strong,
In the end a laurel earneth
Nobler than the highest song.

Onward! in a bold reliance
On the strength ye have within;
Bid your foes a stern defiance,
And their homage ye shall win.

Life is not a time for dreaming,
Standing still or asking when,
Mere resolves or wordy seeming,
Duty calls for earnest men.

He who yields is base and craven,
Nothing worth in strife and toil;
But the firm shall reach their haven,
Proudly bearing off the spoil.

Gird ye, then, with bold endeavor;
Press ye onward, while ye may;
Keeping Trust and Hope forever,
Angel-guardians by the way.

MASONRY AND THE COLORED MEN.

BY PRES. C. A. BLANCHARD.

Some time since, while standing in a book-store in Chicago a colored man came in and inquired for a book on Masonry. I was somewhat struck by the occurrence, as a few years since while actively engaged in the lecture field I had spoken and worked against the lodge in nineteen States and Canada without ever meeting a colored Mason. Shortly after this occurrence a friend who had united with the College church some time before, publicly renounced this institution, he having been Grand Lodge Lecturer for the Colored Masons of Illinois the year before. The facts stated by him did not lessen my interest in the matter. Near the close of December there came to me from a former student a letter, extracts from which are given below. The writer is a young man, who, after the war, saved a few hundreds of dollars which he put into the Freedmen's bank and lost. He then came North, and, saving four hundred dollars put it into the State Savings Institution of Chicago and lost it. He then came to our college and studied for a time but is now at work in a Western city. There are some other matters in the letter but I transcribe all that will be of interest to your readers:

My Dear Sir:—I am going to ask for some information respecting Freemasonry. It is a thing that I took no notice of previous to my going to Wheaton College. Since then I have regarded it as an institution that is founded upon principles that are to fatal to those of true righteousness and equity to be atoned for by all the good that it may embrace. Am I right? I am more anxious to know this because Masonry is the all-important subject with colored men in this and other parts of the country. Here in —— a new lodge has been established; and the earnest and repeated solicitations which come to me from members who would have me join, backed as they often are, by appeals to the highest authority and their to me, unanswerable arguments to prove that it is a good and holy fraternity, have caused me to wonder if yourself and others have not been mistaken in the decision which you have rendered against it."

This letter, joined with the other facts which have come to my knowledge, lead me to believe that there is a wide-spread and determined effort to yoke in the colored men of America to this triumphal car of the devil and thus make them seven-fold more slaves than when they were in bondage to their white task-masters. If this be so it is important to prevent this result by disseminating information among the colored people of the North who are most in danger. With this fact in mind, I submitted the letter from which the above extract is taken, to the seceding Grand Lecturer above mentioned, requesting him to prepare a personal testimony which I might send to my friend: He did so and his answer is found below:

"Dear Friend and Brother:—I hope you will excuse the liberty I am about to take, as it is at the request of Prof. Blanchard I pen you these lines in reference to the order of Freemasonry. I am, or rather have been a Free-mason of high degree, I declare the order to be a mock, a snare and a delusion. It may have to some people a specious appearance, but this appearance is wholly destitute of reality or truth, and dangerously affects the real concerns of public and private life. Its boasted benevolence is selfish, its designs are corrupt, and its influences are for evil. They produce their results in darkness, and their operations are carefully concealed from the public eye. Moreover this enforced secrecy enjoined and maintained at the peril of one's life, is really inconsistent and at varience with the spirit and teachings of the Bible. I would advise you to avoid it as you would a lion, for it is more dangerous.

"It is not like other societies, that you may join, and when convinced of their evil effects, or injurious tendencies (if unhappily such exist,) you may withdraw at pleasure. They claim that "once a Mason is always a Mason." It is like being encircled in the coil of a deadly serpent from whose poisonous fangs there is no escape. Their secret forms of initiation in the start are a violation of self-respect and a gross insult to decency. Just think of a man being led into a lodge, or any other place, with a rope tied about his neck and in a half naked, slip-shod, destitute condition.

"It is also true that many Freemasons are irreligious, numbers of them believe in no hereafter, and the Bible asks: 'What communication hath light with darkness, and what part hath he that believeth with an infidel," Even the association with such men will hinder religious growth and the expansion of Christian graces. Freemasons are a body of oath bound men whose connection I am satisfied you would ever have occasion to regret."

This testimony from one who has so recently broken his chains is very interesting and important. Let us pray God for the dear brother who gives it, and also that the light may spread in time to save the hundreds of thousands of freedmen from the bondage of the lodge.

NEWS FROM THE COMET.

On our Masonic earth location is often hard to describe. This must be infinitely more difficult in our wide heavens. After a peep at our Grand Master, his place must be a point of interest to his majestic children all about.

Well, then, you must keep in mind the fact that we reach conclusions by contraries. In our mode of speaking, darkness is put for light, below for above, etc. The G. L. A. is in harmony with this mode of speaking. When our Revs. speak of the "Grand Lodge above" they may look upward with solemn, sanctified look, but the angel of the B. P. (bottomless pit) will be in readiness, all the same, to receive our virtuous brethren, who are read and prayed up (?) to the G. L. A. He gave us our language and of course understands its terms to perfection. We believe our metropolis is mentioned in the "book of the law" used by us in this country. We need not mention the name as it is unpopular. To promote the comfort and the quiet of our celestial craft this place is as far removed as is practicable from the throne of one Despot, whom we would, but cannot, dethrone. We are a unit in our intense hatred of that King; and in this our unity consists. Still we cannot step out of his dominion, though we be "punished from his presence and the glory of his power." In one thing is our glory—that in our make up the distance between us and that King is infinite; and growing greater. So mote it be!

Cheers throughout the caverns of this limitless empire, echoing even from "brimstone" lake, almost rending the comet. We cannot give our dear readers the exact geography of this sultry empire. Its population is too great to be numbered. When you find the greatest distance from the (to us) obnoxious King you will be nearest the G. L. A. Legions of the population here are unlike those of our earth in some respects. Earth was never their home, though some of them were once associated with a tragic scene near Gadara. These, and legions like them, belong to our sublime craft, whose stolen motto is "Faith, Hope and Charity." Could our foes know our power, they would better understand one of their own authors who, 1800 years ago, said, "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood," etc. But we are not anxious to have them take in the real situation, lest they go to their King with it, and we be "tormented before the time."

Hark! Our Grand Master calls up the whole lodge. Excitement! Grand Master sighs—almost groans! Lucifer speaks.

"Let the Grand Inspectors General of the N. Jurisdiction and the S. Jurisdiction of the U. S. A. come forth."

"At your pleasure, Worshipful."

"Fly to brimstone lake,' thundered he, "and summon ten legions of my best subjects and let them be all 'thrice potents.' Bring no novices."

Prince of the Royal Secret asks, in great excitement, "Anything wrong?"

With screams of vengeance he exclaimed, "Chicago! Washington!" A new way he has of swearing.

"When," quoth he, "Chicago was made a great city, hope cheered the great deep of my mystic empire. Cheer after cheer went up till the brimstone ran low. 'Liquor and the lodge,' shouted every loyal soul from the sublime 33d to the E. A. Mason. Added to the two Ls were many other hopeful traits of like character, inspiring high hopes for Chicago as an auxiliary of my empire."

Here he shed off some luminous tears and again

exelaimed, "Chieago! Cynosure! 221 Madison street," and subsided into a spasm.

Then all the sublimes knew the eause. The subsequent seene beggared all deseription. Our Grand Master once more opened his fiery orbs and with a voiee that shook the realm as ten thousand earthquakes, thundered, "Washington, D. C.! Paradise lost! The Anti-masons are taking Washington, or I am no liar, and the truth is in me!"

Said his majesty, "Let us pray." And thus he prayed, "Magnates of the Star Route, Mistakes of Moses, save us."

He learned to pray in the lodge and can use the most sanetimonious, ehurehly style in the most pathetie tremulo whieh no Masonie Rev. or D.D. ean outdo, nor ean they seem more sineerely in earnest.

Again he rallies and mutters, "N. C. A.," and looks toward Chieago shuddering. He takes a text and preaehes. "Let us alone," is his text, and no noncommittal priest or prelate, even of these "please-the-flesh" times eould beat him. The sermon is reported in full in the Brimstone News. He has sworn twenty-five men to shut the mouth of Bro. Williams of Minnesota. Sink him with Morgan and he will "let us alone."

Lo! a wedding is brewing. The bride of Lueifer who for eenturies has rode the "searlet colored beast," is growing old. He has for years been making love to the Protestant ehureh (so-ealled) and has made an impression, strangely enough—on the reputed daughter Zion! She entertains him in many of her reception rooms! Wait and see what next.

Orion.

Odd-Fellow Smokers.—There is no doubt but the associations in the Odd-fellows lodge are demoralizing. The members often go to the lodge to have fun, and their fun is not of an elevating character. A young convert to Christ cannot go to the lodge without coming under a dangerous influence. Many persons can date the beginning of their down-fall to their visits to the lodge. An Odd-fellow writing of the lodge practices, draws a most revolting picture of common scenes in the lodge. Here is his language: "Let us suppose that on the night of initiation he (the candidate) had found a dirty ante room, filled with tobacco smoke or stained with its filthy juice; the outside guardian a rough and untidy man; the brethren jesting him upon the treatment he was to receive; the paraphernalia dirty and odorous with tobacco smoke and untidy in every way.....I am persuaded, after long observation, that forty per cent. of our members, who are dropped for non-payment of dues, are lost to us by this cause."

This is only one of the many evidences of the evil habits of many members of the lodges. They are not model places for a Christian to visit. There is none of the Spirit of Christ among them. Their pleasure is not "joy to the Holy Ghost" but much of it might be denominated "revelling." Let no Christian think he can go with the ungodly and not be injured.

A Sad Dilemma.—Our village lodge is in a bad fix. It pays four hundred dollars rent for its "upper chamber." Dupes pay this rent, and politicians get the benefit of it. But if dupes refuse to pay dues any longer, how are politicians to pay the rent? This is rather of a hard nut to crack for the Hirams about these times.

But luckily for them a new resource offers itself. They may agree with dupes to get fraudulent pensions for them under the condition of receiving such a share of the back dues as will pay the rent and form a fund for meeting it in all time to come.

The Hirams are sly rogues. It is easy for them to swear (they have learned the trade) to a man's right to a pension.

The National Journal of Education, published in Boston, speaks as follows about the action of the late Legislature with reference to Purdue University:

"The Indiana Legislature has evidently been stricken by an educational 'blizzard.' With stupidity unparalleled, even in the records of school legislation, it has interfered with the government of Purdue University, and made its annual appropriation to this, the agricultural and mechanical college of the State, conditional on the repeal of a sensible act of the University trustees, forbidding the establishment of the Greek letter secret societies among the students. How many of these conscript fathers would know a 'Greek letter' by sight, we are not informed. The act is in the same line as the policy of our L.L. D. Governor in Massachusetts. In the one case refractory students are exalted over the heads of the government; in the other, State's prison pupils are taken into council in the election of a warden. President E. E. White has very properly resigned, and, if his retirement is accepted, the people of Indiana may thank their Legislature for ousting one of the formost educational men in America. In true logical sequence the same enlightened body has changed the heads of the charitable institutions, and adjourned without voting the ordinary appropriations for education. Truly did General Grant in the White House say: 'There seems to be too much reading and writing now for some of these people up at the Capitol.'"

AMONG THE ZUNI S.

After dusk, the giant figures which had been left on the plain aeross the river came in one by one. They were, by all odds, the most monstrous conceptions I had seen among the Znni dances. They were at least twelve feet high. Their gigantic heads were shocks of long black hair with great horns at the sides, green masks with huge, protruding eye-balls, and long, pointed, square-ended, wooden beaks; and their bodies were draped with embroidered and tasseled cotton blankets, underneath which only the tiny, bare, painted feet of the actor eould be seen. The spasmodic rolling of the great eyeballs and the sharp snapping of the beak as it rapidly opened and closed, together with a fan-shaped arrangement of eagle-feathers at the back of the head, gave these figures the appearance of angry monster-birds.

To each new house of the pueblo one of these monsters was guided by two priests. The latter were clad in closely fitting buck-skin armor, and round, helmet-like skull-caps of the same material. Several elaborately costumed flute-players, together with a Ko-yi-ma-shi or two, attended. After prayers and ceremonials before the ladders of the houses to be entered, each with his two attendant priests, mounted with great difficulty, descended through the sky-hole, and was stationed at one end of the room, near the side of an altar, differing only in details from the one already deseribed as belonging to the Ko yi-ma-shis. Immense fires of sputtering pinon-wood, and rude, bowl-shaped lamps of grease, brilliantly lighted up each one of these closely curtained rooms.

Toward midnight, my brother explained to me that, in each new room and sacred house of Zuni, the twelve "medicine" orders of the tribe were to meet, and that, as he was a priest of one of them, I could go with him, if I would sit very quiet in one corner and not move, sleep, nor speak during the entire night.

As we entered the closely crowded, spacious room into which the first party of dancers had retired, a space was being cleared lengthwise through the center, from the altar down toward the opposite end. With many a hasty admonition, the Governor placed me in a corner so near the hearth that, for a long time, controlled by his directions, I was nearly suffocated by the heat. Along the northern side of the room were the dancers, their masks now laid aside. Conspicuous among them were the two priests, who were engaged in a long, rhythmical prayer, chant, or ritual, over eight or ten nearly prostrate Indians who squatted on the floor at their feet. As soon as this prayer was ended, great steaming bowls of meat, trays of paper-bread, and baskets of melons were plaeed in rows along the cleared space. A loud prayer was uttered over them by an old priest, who held in his hands a bow, some arrows, and a war-club, and who wore over one shoulder a strange badge of buckskin ornamented with sea-shells and flint arrow-heads.‡ He was followed by the Priest of the Sun, from the other end of the room. The little fire-god then passed along the array of vituals, waving his torch over them, with which the feast was pronounced ready.

Many of the dishes were plaeed before the dancers and priests and a group of singers whose nearly nude bodies were grotesquely painted with streaks and daubs of white. They were gathered, rattles in hand, around an immense earthen kettle-drum at the left side of the altar, opposite the now crouching monster. As soon as the feast was concluded, many of the women bore away on their heads, in huge bowls, such of the food as remained.

The singers then drawing closely around the drum, facing one another, struck up a loud chant, which, accompanied by the drumming and the rattles, filled the whole apartment with a reverberating din, to me almost unendurable. Two by two the dancers would rise, step rapidly and high from one foot to the other, until, covered with perspiration and almost exhaused, they were relieved by others. At the close of each verse in the endless chant, the great figure by the altar would start up from its half sitting posture, until its head nearly touched the ceiling, and, with a startling series of reports, would clap its long beak and roll its protruding eyes in time to the music.

When the little fire-god took his place in the center of the room, no one relieved him for more than an hour and a half, and I feared momentarily that he would drop from sheer exaustion. But I learned later that this was a trial ceremonial, and that it was one of the series of preparations which he had to pass through before becoming a priest, to which rank his birth rendered him eligible.

Just as the morning star was rising, the music ceased, the congregation became silent, and the chief dancer was led to the center of the room, where he was elaborately costumed. Then the Priest of the Sun took him up the ladder to the roof, where, facing the East, he prouounced in measured, solemn tones a long prayer to the waning Sun of the Old Year. Descending, he pronounced before the multitude (signalizing the end of each sentence with a clang of his rattles) a metrical ritual of even greater length. Then the spectators gathered around the altar, and hastily said their prayers, the sound of which reminded me of a recitation in concert in a large school-room. The sun rose, and they dispersed to their various homes.

Some time after, the dancers, one by one, still in costume, passed over the river toward the southward; and the monsters, to the sounds of chants, accompanied by rude music on the flutes, were guided across to a flat, snow-covered plain, where, in the presence of the assembled priests of Zuni,—but no others,—they ran back and forth, one after another, over a great square, planted plumed sticks at either end of it, and, forming a procession, slowly marched away and vanished among the southern hills. Toward evening no fewer than seven curious dance lines of the Ka-ka at one time occupied the principal court. Most of that, as well as of the three succeeding nights, were passed in ceremonials at the sacred houses and estufas. With this the great festival was over. The assembled Indian visitors, laden with food and and the products of Zuni looms, departed for their various tribal homes.

‡This, I afterward learned, was Nai-iu-tchi, the Chief Priest of the Bow, or the high-priest of a powerful sacred order of war, in many ways strangely like the Masonic order, and of which I have since become a member.

SHORT SERMON.

Text—"We cannot tell."

My Brethren:—If you ask any of our average newspaper editors whether Masonry is from Heaven or from men, they will reason within themselves in this wise: If we say from heaven, we shall make egregious asses of ourselves, for no one but a knave or an ass can, possibly persuade himself that Masonry comes, as it claims to do, from Heaven. And if on the other hand we say that it comes from a set of drunken infidels in Apple Tree Tavern London, we fear a loss of subscribers from the enmity of the lodge, for all lodgeites pretend to believe in the divinity of Masonry.

The answer, therefore, that we get from our editors, our ministers of the Gospel, and our statesmen is this which we have taken for our text, viz., "We cannot tell."

My friend; it is time to take away political power from men who cannot tell where Masonry comes from.

So mote it be!

ANIMISM AND SUN-WORSHIP.

The word animism is used to express the primitive form of religion which is found among savage people in all parts of the world. It comes from the belief that everything and every person consists of two parts—a body and spirit. The beings which fill the Indian universe are not supernatural, and do not have the attributes of God, but are more like the spirits which some people think manifest themselves at the present time. These may be the spirits of animals, or ghosts of any kind. Every river and every bend of a river has a spirit. The spirits of falls, cataracts, or rapids are especially dreaded. Drowning is ofttimes ascribed to the work of a spirit. It is probable that sun-worship originated from this, and in the following way: Everything having a body and spirit, the sun is supposed to be a sun-spirit, as well as a sun-form. Hence the superstitious regard for it. Thus it is the same in reality with animism and with animal worship; for the natives do not distinguish such beings as sun and moon from men and other animals. Plants and other objects, winds and storms, rocks and trees, animals and men, sun and moon, all have both a body and soul. The last number of the Anthropological Journal contains an article on the subject by E. A. Im. Thurm, which is partly a review of Mr. Dorman's book, but which is also suggestive of the religious ideas prevalent among the Indians of British Guiana. The author says, "The spirits of all rocks are supposed to be capable of harm; and sculptured rocks are especially dreaded." American Antiquarian.

TOO MUCH FOR HIM AT LAST.

It is generally conceded that our President is a very polite man, and is generally able to maintain his civil and obliging manners under very discouraging circumstances; but an incident has occurred at last which has proved quite too much for him. A woman office-seeker, the papers tell us, was so persistent in her efforts, and so utterly regardless of all decent manners, that the President was at last forced to abruptly turn his back upon her and attend to some one else who had equal claims upon him with herself.

Now, when the head of the nation, having no body-guards, no grand chamberlains, no masters of ceremonies, no ministers of court, none of the rulers and precedents of aristocratic government to defend him, is thus besieged, overcome, and made to yield his good manners in sheer self-defense, is it not time that our public schools should take the subject into consideration and see if some plan could not be devised for improving our manners? Which is likely to prove the worse President-killers, the bad manners of our public schools, or the bad morals of our Booths and Guiteaus?

This subject has been agitated for many years, yet the spirit of our school management is so intensely narrow, selfish, and political, that even men who aspire to be leading educators shrink from the undemocratic idea of meuding manners. The measure, however, is sustained by many of the first educators of the country; and the plan published by Messrs. Chenay and Clapp, of Brattleboro, Vermont, is being slowly introduced, though in opposition to an immense dead weight of prejudice, ignorance, apathy and indifference. The utility of the measure is so evident that the vis inertia against it is not simply wonderful, but it is miraculous. It is like the uncultured boorishness of the Pennsylvania Dutchman who was ashamed and indignant at the idea of having carpets upon his floors. It would not be polite on the part of the minor order of educators to endeavor to overcom this honest boorishness. Some of them seem to think that boorishness is necessary to honesty. It stands greatly in the way, however, even of our republican government, as well as in that of decent society.

American Politics.

NOMINATIONS FOR 1884.

For President,
JONATHAN BLANCHARD
OF ILLINOIS.

For Vice President,
JOHN A. CONANT,
OF CONNECTICUT.

PLATFORM.

We hold: 1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That God requires and man needs a Sabbath.

3. That the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is the true policy on the temperance question.

4. That the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

5. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by articles 13th, 14th and 15th of our amended Constitution should be preserved inviolate.

6. That arbitration of differences with nations is the most direct and sure method of securing and perpetuating a permanent peace.

7. That to cultivate the intellect without improving the morals of men, is to make mere adepts and experts; therefore, the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

8. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

9. That the government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

10. That maintenance of the public credit, protection to all loyal citizens, and justice to Indians are essential to the honor and safety of our nation.

11. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice-president of the United States.

HOW IT WORKS.

All the offices in Vermont are filled by the favor or indulgence of the lodge, and all its officers represent the lodge and not the Republic. And so powerful has the lodge become that it rides rough shod over the law and the constitution of the State.

Here is an instance of the way the lodge works. It is a provision of the State Constitution that no Federal officer shall hold a seat in the legislature, but the legislature has repeatedly connived at its violation. At length, however, a case was brought before it that was too glaring to be hid under the usual hood-wink. How should it be disposed of? The case was clear to anybody but Masons. It was the duty of the governor to direct the attention of he legis lature to it; and it was the plain duty of the legislature to vote the seat vacant without having its attention called to it. But what was done? A recommendation was sent forth to the people by the legislature to alter the Constitution so as to require members to swear that they do not hold Federal offices!

Here is the Masonic idea of governing men by imposing oaths upon them, instead of enforcing the law, as it should be done, in a republican manner, by the executive and legislative powers of the government. It is by such insidious means that the republican force and vitality of the State is continually being undermined and weakened by the workings of the lodge. There was no more need or propriety of altering the Constitution to secure its execution than there was of introducing into it a provision for selling eggs by weight instead of by the dozen. The more oaths a government prescribes the weaker it is.

Under the lodge power the State was disgraced by being made a party to the scandalous back-pay grab. One of the Senators of the State finding his back-pay grab too dirty for a senator's pockets, offered it to the State treasury. A Masonic Legislature took it with a spirit of apparent thankfulness, and soon after re-elected him to the Senate, right in opposition to a clause of the Constitution providing for the purity of elections.

The reader may remember how the State was disgraced by its electing a Federal office-holder a member of the college of electors, and how the general government had to be called on to help the State out of the difficulty. Vermont, by coming under lodge-rule, has ceased to be the model Republican State that it once was.

The State, though hardly half as populous and rich as some second-class city, was once a model republic; but now, under its present leaders, it has become a Masonic lodge. Any influence that it has upon national affairs will be exercised in favor of the lodge and not in favor of the republic. The whole action of the political leaders of the State will be in favor of a Masonic candidate for the Presidency. The leaders would aid the Democratic party rather than vote for an Anti-mason. Under lodge-rule Vermont will look to the national government for pensions, back-pay grabs, and legal and political support instead of imparting republican vitality to the general government.

Our American party must look facts in the face. We cannot afford to admit into our calculations factors that express false quantities. We must make thorough work with the lodge and all its abettors, or it will give the finishing death stroke to the principles of our American party. Vermonter.

JOSEPH COOK ON POLITICAL AND MUNICIPAL PROBLEMS.

Last week the great Boston lecturer was banqueted by the Congregational Club of Chicago at the Palmer House, and during the evening made a characteristic and forcible address, from which are taken the following extracts:

PERILS OF UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE.

Can universal suffrage be adopted by great cities without elevating the scoundrel classes to the summit of affairs? Ask New York. Ask Chicago. Inquire at the Golden Gate. Put the question to Melbourne, in Australia. The answer thus far is at least a hesitating, doubtful affirmative. Our enemies abroad say that ultimately the answer must be a withering negative. Lord Beaconsfield was accustomed to look across the Atlantic and affirm that there was not in the United States a single city of over a hundred thousand inhabitants that was well governed. We have twelve cities of that size, or which will soon, every one of them have 200,000 people. Run through the list, and then tell me whether Lord Beaconsfield is so far from the truth as hot American patriotism would say. On our proud Atlantic seaboard, or in the immediate vicinity of it, we have Boston, New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington. Here in the Mississippi Valley you have Cinciunati, Cleveland, Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans, and on the Pacific slope we have San Francisco. All these cities have, or soon will have, 200,000 inhabitants or more. Which of them has a government which make life and property thoroughly safe? In which of those cities has Republican management, or Democratic, on the average succeeded in lifting itself above the clutches of the whisky ring? In my city of Boston the power that governs the rum-shop has elected the Mayor for the last twenty-five years, with but few exceptions, and although Boston is not troubled with such a mass of persons from outside of the country as many other cities, we are under the power of the corrupt classes more than two-thirds of the time in our municipal history.

I want citizens to vote as they please. I hold it no shame for men to vote irrespective of party when their municipal interests are at stake. It is time we should have local elections turning on local questions, and not let politicians dictate to us either in cities or States. This doctrine is very popular in the East. I would have it considered a dishonor for a man of high character to decline a nomination for an important place in a city government. I know that men often make less money by going into the public service, but there is no improvement that we need more than this. Mr. Foster told us that America needs nothing so much as the participation of our best citizens in municipal affairs. Perhaps we may ultimately call for a State police for our city government.

RESTRICT SUFFRAGE.

I would have the reading test applied to the whole country. I would not take a vote from any man who votes now, but would take the advice of President Grant —that all those who are born after a certain date to be announced, say 1925, should not have the right to vote unless they were able to read and write. I have heard the same advice in Maine and Wisconsin. Let the people speak out on this subject. It is not too late to get back to the right test.

My next reform would be, compulsory voting. It is said that in your recent election, which turned out not to your satisfaction—[laughter] at least 10,000 citizens did not vote. There was a recent election in Ohio, in which it was supposed that 40,000 did not vote. In Athens those who did not vote were fined. I would have a small fine exacted from every man who was able to be on the streets and did not vote. I am not convinced yet that even in New York and Chicago the refuse outnumber the respectable people. If you will confine the suffrage to those who can read and write there may be an assurance of reform.

WOMEN VOTERS ON TEMPERANCE.

For one, I should be perfectly willing to have women vote on matters of temperance. Nay, if you will grant municipal suffrage to those women who can read and write, ultimately I would give women municipal suffrage in that case. Now though I am no woman suffragist, they would destroy the whisky ring. Give me all these various reforms, and I believe that the result would be what we wish for; Cotton was said to be king; now whisky is king. Remember that the power represented by whisky rings is organized on selfish principles. It is always in action. Whisky rings night and day ply their infamous trade and connect their business with immoralities that cannot be named. I hold that no respectable man can remain long in the business of selling liquor. You say that is stern doctrine. You ask me if I am in favor of high license. I doubt whether I would vote for high license. I know you can buy liquor in great cities in Maine. The law is not perfectly executed. But then the decalogue itself is not obeyed, but it is not therefore the less necessary. We have murders, but that does not make the laws against murders any the less desirable.

IN CHRISTIANITY THE GREATEST HOPE.

Among these remedies we must have reform journals and aggressive churches. It is said that politics must not be brought into the church. But ministers have not only the right to discuss but are expected to discuss all topics which have freedom and good for their purpose. But after all, my friends, the supreme hope for the salvation of cities and the republic at large is just the work which our Lord and Saviour did—the model for every age, going from house to house doing good. Thomas Chalmers organized and supported a church amongst the poorest classes of Glasgow. Chalmers held that there was no portion of a great town so destitute that it could not and would not support its own church and school buildings. Bring the gospel to every cradle and every fireside and every death bed, and the problem of municipal government will be olved. Otherwise, never.

No, my friends, we are not goiug to take a monarchy. First, because we cannot; second, because we need not. This question of municipal government we can solve, because we must, and we must because we can. A retreat is impossible. Into what shall we retreat? Ceutralized government, au aristocracy, or monopoly? Four-fifths of Americans do not live in great cities, and they would prevent you from doing that. Other cities are well-governed. Rather than to suffer you to do that the rest of the country will govern you themselves. You must conquer. American ingenuity and American perseverance will take these evils by the neck and end them.

QUESTIONS IN POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY.

A set of politicians got up a ring; hire an "upper chamber" under the pretence of holding sacred rites there; agree to pay four hundred dollars annual rent for the chamber, and take in dupes at 25 dollars each. Sixteen dupes a year pay for the rent, the politicians getting the benefit of it. But at last another party sells the "degrees" for 25 cents instead of 25 dollars, and the politicians do not get enough to pay the rent, so that they have to pay a considerable portion of the rent out of their own pockets, while the benefits are on the decrease.

Now the question is:

First. Would it be politically right for these politicians to promise their dupes to get them pensions from the government for Bull Run, provided that out of their back pensions they will help pay for the rent?

Second. Is it politically right to vote for these politicians; or for any one who, by joining the lodge, has at any time given them "aid and comfort?"

Third. Is it right politically, morally, religiously, or honestly to vote for a Hiramite or Dynamite?

Will General Butler, the "Masonic candidate" please answer?

EIGHT BOXES.

A Washington telegram describes the devices of devil ish ingenuity made by Southern legislators to prevent the black vote from affecting anything:

"The real purpose of the Government in the prosecution of the election frauds in South Carolina is to bring the new State law, if possible, known as the 'Eight-Box law,' into the United States courts. This 'Eight-Box law' is designed to destroy the colored vote. It permits the erection of a fence eight feet high arouud every polling place; allows a separate box for each candidate voted for, the number of which, in the last election, was eight; puts the Democratic election officers alone inside this inclosure, and admits but one voter at a time. A colored man who cannot read, admitted to such an inclosure, could only by chance deposit his ticket in the right box, and all ballots put in the wrong boxes are rejected. The Government has evidence that the Democratic election officers never allow Democrats to make mistakes in their boxes. This is the 'Eight-Box law.' It remains to be seen whether the Attorney-General can obtain any jurisdiction over such a State law. Care is to be taken by the South Carolina authorities when Congressmen are voted for not to violate any National laws. But it is the purpose of the 'Eight-Box law' to perpetuate the rule of the South Carolina white Democracy."

A Great Discovery.—Governor B. F. Butler has discovered that sixty-nine and one-sixth per cent of the money paid by Massachusetts for her charitable and reform institutions goes for salaries. So he claims. Now this is less than the lodge charges for carrying on the charities and reforms of Freemasonry. Gen. Butler finds fault with the State, why not with the lodge? He stands as high in the lodge as he does in the State. Why not, therefore, as Grand Sovereign Inspector General of the lodge, point out to young Americans how they are being swindled out of seventy-five per cent, more or less (rather more), of their money under pretences of serving widows and orphans? Kitchen Gardner.

A good brother forwards an article attempting to explain why the church of Rome opposes secret societies. We do not, and never did, consider it a purely Christian motive on her part, but that is no concern of ours. We are well content that she continues to oppose, without stopping to criticise the mode or motive. There were some who would not have prevented others casting out devils in the name of Christ, because they followed not with the disciples. If the good Lord is willing to let these two powers of evil antagonize each other and thus serve his will, who are we that we should complain or criticise?—Free Methodist.

New England.

THE NEW ENGLAND BOARD of the National Christian Association has its headquarters at No. 8 Portland St., Worcester, Mass. A full supply of books and tracts constantly on hand. Orders promptly filled. Correspondence solicited.

E. D. Bailey N. E. Sec'y.

—Miss E. E. Flagg sends the following: "At one place where I called a lady told me an anecdote which pleased me. The husband of a friend of hers was teased persistently to join the Masons on account of the great benefit it would be to his family. She did not wish him to join and proposed that he should pay the money to her instead of the lodge. He consented, and paid his dues regularly, only they went into his wife's hands instead of the lodge. As a consequence his wife has quite a handsome sum in the bank and both parties are satisfied with the arrangement."

—An unusual revival interest has prevailed in Boston, through the influence of a union movement led by the evangelists. Fast day some of the churches dispensed with the usual sermon and held a union prayer-meeting from 3 to 9 P. M., led by different pastors each hour. The one held in the Park Street church was very large and of unusual interest. In the evening the house was full. The congregation filled the time to overflowing with prayers and exhortations.

—A Baptist minister, speaking in Worcester in behalf of education in Utah, declared secret societies to be the bulwark of Mormonism.

—The following is the latest news from the Vermont convention preparation:

Hardwick, Vt., April 14th, 1883.

"Am well and find great encouragement in the work. I shall stay here until Tuesday. Lecture Monday evening. Will go on to Burlington from here and can let you know from there the time and place of the convention. Great work this is and there are some great ways taken to hinder and oppose. But we get on very well so far.

SERMONS AND HEARERS.

Worcester, Mass., April 17, 1883.

Last Sunday my sermon at Washburne Hall was devoted exclusively to a demonstration of the anti-Christian character of the secret orders. The discourse was the culmination of a series of discourses on false worships. The discourses awakened no little interest on the subject in the minds of those who heard them and this last one of course produced not a little stir hereabouts. It was favorably received by most of the hearers, among whom were a number of Masons and Odd-fellows. Although I had several times spoken against the secret orders in the same place and others had condemned them in the prayer-meetings, I had not previously entered into a detailed discussion of the subject, and many were not familiar with the facts which lead us to oppose them.

It seems to be the general opinion of those familiar with the facts that we have gained a good many warm friends of the cause by the course pursued. We know of some who have withdrawn from the lodges, of others who have practically withdrawn by ceasing to obey the summons sent them, and of still others who give unmistakable evidence of quickened consciences; while we frequently hear of men and women who declare they will have nothing to do with the secret orders, having become convinced of their unchristian character.

While these favorable things are transpiring it is painful to see some wilfully closing their eyes or stifling their consciences. Among other secretists who favored me with some attention, at the close of my sermon Sunday, was a Knight Templar who was formerly a very active Christian, but who joined the lodge and has since rapidly degenerated in spirituality. He defended the claim of the lodge to regenerating power, declared the lodges were "helping men more than the churches" and that he proposed to "go higher" as soon as he could spare the money.

Another Mason, from whom I hoped for better things, declared that the time of his greatest spiritual prosperity was when he was most regular in attendance upon the lodge! These two cases were enough to justify our opposition, for they are evident examples of lodge infatuation. Two other secretists, however, signified very different feelings and are anxious to pursue the subject further, one of them declaring that he was convinced but wished to be well enough informed to convince others.

It is evident that more attention should be given by us to Odd-fellowship. It is increasing more rapidly than Freemasonry and probably already exceeds it in point of numbers in the United States, though the published statistics of Freemasonry are still ahead; but they are not so accurate in their statistics. Their revenue is enormous and their pretended benevolence is deceiving thousands. There are many who join the order and withdraw after having penetrated the fraud, but they come out a "damaged article," while their names serve as decoys to entrap others whom they are not at liberty to warn, by reason of the obligation imposed upon them.

The Freemasons of this State are greatly rejoiced in the success of their effort to liquidate their debt. For sixteen years they have struggled under an enormous debt on the Boston Temple—a debt so great that many of their number feared it never would be paid. By the efforts of the Medford distiller who was and is Grand Master, they commuted the debt and have paid it off, less about $25,000. The remainder they hope to pay this year. They do not, however, forget that their "enemies" (the Anti-masons) are on their track, and their annual wine banquet, as usual, brought to their minds the hand-writing on the wall. The "veterans of '31" are dying off but those who remain do not weary of recounting the brave part they took in defense of their beloved institution fifty years ago, when an indignant people repudiated their shameful oaths and consigned their barbarous institution to deserved contempt. Nothing but a secret order, which works by stealth, could ever have piloted itself back to power again.

Reform News.

LETTERS FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

Grand Rapids, Mich., April 16th, 1883.

Leaving Chicago on the 14th, I was favored with the company of a wealthy ranch owner from California, who, with his wife and son, was returning after an absence of thirty-two years to visit friends in Grand Rapids. After listening to the recital of some stirring incidents in his early adventures as a beginner among the pioneers, I referred to an incident related to me by our friend Andrew Wilcox, in his experience among the early gold-seekers at the "Far West," which naturally led to the consideration of "ways and means" available to new beginners on the frontier.

Among other agencies, that of artificial combinations, with initiatory ceremonies, bonds of mutual aid and secret signs of recognition, came in for their share. He unhesitatingly, and without knowing my views on the subject, gave it as his opinion that connection with any of the secret orders is a serious drawback to an honest man, and that only rogues and swindlers could derive any benefit from them. I gave his wife a copy of Mr. Weed's letter. When she saw what it was, she asked, "Is there anything in it about Dr. Cummings? If there is I won't read it." At the time I did not understand the reason for the remark, but have since learned that the Dr. Cummings, mentioned on the 12th page of Mr. Weed's letter, died here some years ago, and was probably the lady's pastor at one time before she went as a teacher to Sacramento.

Bro. Wing welcomed me here at his home, where I found our irrepressible Bro. Foote already on the ground and in usual health. Announcements had been made in the papers for me to preach Sabbath morning in the Wesleyan church and in Second Street M. E. church in the evening; which appointments I filled. Bro. Foote followed me with an address to the Sabbath school in the W. M. church, which was one of the most searching and effective addresses to which I ever listened. A description is utterly impossible, suffice it to say that he went directly for the conversion of souls, and insisted that the children must be brought to Christ then and there.

Bro. Foote preached at the Wesleyan church in the evening, and the word had free course while he spoke in the power of the Holy Spirit.

To-day we dined with Dr. Veenboer and made the acquaintance of his most estimable and intelligent wife. At two o'clock we repaired to the First Baptist church where we met fifteen of the pastors of different churches in the city, and by the courtesy of the chairman, Rev. Dr. Cook, I gave notice of our convention. After the meeting adjourned, I learned the views of a number present, in personal conversation, and am glad to believe "that they that be with us are more than they that be with them;" and yet I doubt if even one, except Bro. Wing, will show his face at any of our meetings. We shall see and report.

A SIGNIFICANT FACT. WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

I have had occasion to consult with three gentlemen recently on matters pertaining to our reform work, which are liable to be considered in the courts. These gentlemen are practicing in different States and are each eminent in their profession. Two have acted as judges for several years, and the third is a leading lawyer in the city of over 40,000 inhabitants where he resides. Each of these gentlemen have voluntarily introduced the question of Masonic influence in the courts, and have insisted that it was an important factor in the case. Two of them at least had been Masons. One, who I was told still adheres, said, "You must remember that our legislature has a number of high Masons in it, and that if the case should come before our Supreme Court some of the judges recently appointed are very zealous advocates of the order and high up in the degrees themselves." If Masonry has nothing to do with politics and never influences the decisions of courts, why is it that men of knowledge and experience take this question into the account when estimating the probabilities of defeat or success in any given case in the legislature or Supreme Court? Masons often tell us that Masonry has nothing to do with politics, legislation or court decisions. If so, what is the explanation? There is a mystery here for the craft to clear up.

THE STATE CONVENTION.

Chicago, Apr. 20.—I left Grand Rapids at 8:45 last evening. Bro. Starry was at work on the third degree with a fair audience. The convention was well attended from abroad considering the rush of farming at this season. On the whole it was in my judgment the best convention yet held in our reform in Michigan. There was an entire absence of self-seeking and grumbling, and a cordial co-operation which rendered the meeting not only agreeable but enabled it to make plans for the future and to inaugurate movements, which, if vigorously carried out, will revolutionize the State in its attitude on the secrecy question. Details I leave for the secretary whose report will be read with profit. J. P. Stoddard.

THE MICHIGAN CONVENTION.

The Grand Rapids daily papers, or which there are five, gave quite full and fair reports of the State Convention of last week. While we wait for the secretary's report some items may be gleaned from their columns.

The following counties were represented in the convention: Allegan, Barry, Branch, Calhoon, Clinton, Eaton, Ionia, Jackson, Kalamazoo, Kent, Lenawee, Macomb, Manistee, Muskegon, Oakland, Oceana, Ottawa, Saginaw, Payne. Prominent among the members were brethren Foote, Bunnel, Hudson, Canfield, Inman, Bush, Springstein, Preston, Day, Ross, Bruce, Tapley, Hill, Poole, Thompson, Swansea, Buffham, Flieman, Veenboer, Leggett, Avery. and others from Michigan; and brethren Stoddard, Starry, Schoenberger and Bennett from abroad.

The officers of the convention were as follows:

President—J. L. Bush, of Muskegon.

Recording Secretary—Rev. A. H. Springstein, of Oakland.

Corresponding Secretary—Rev. William Wing, of Kent.

Treasurer—Rev. C. C. Foote, of Wayne.

Executive Committee—Rev. E. W. Bruce, of Jackson; Dr. L. J. Wicker, of Oakland; and Rev. J. H. Canfield, Kalamazoo.

Rev. C. C. Foote, however, declined, saying that he had already been treasurer several years and thought he should be superceded by a younger man. He was not discouraged by his past experience, but felt that he was too old for the work. His wish was honored and another was selected to fill the place.

During the second day there was general discussion of the formation of the proposed Alliance and of various other matters of interest. It was decided to continue the publication of the Michigan American with Rev. H. A. Day as editor, and the paper was made the organ of the American party for Michigan.

In a prelude to his 158th lecture in Boston, Feb. 26, Joseph Cook discusses "Revivals, True and False." He says the church for the times will:

1. Reach the whole population.
2. Emphasize the hidden half of Christian unity.
3. Ascertain what hinders individuals from accepting Christianity.
4. Teach church members to give a reason for the faith that is in them.
5. Teach church members to converse on personal religion with the religiously irresolute.
6. Prepare for revivals, as the spring prepares in its earlier for its later season.
7. Protect the fruits of revivals, as the summer ripens the births of spring.
8. Make religion a personal matter, and will preach so as to secure immediate decision of the soul to accept God in Christ, as both Savior and Lord.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WEED, STEVENS AND THEIR COMPEERS.

All numbers of the Cynosure are good, but two recent issues have special attractions: those with likenesses of Weed and Stevens. I learned to know these men about fifty-five years ago, for their noble and fearless stand against secret societies. The idea of putting before us their likenesses, with liberal, illustrative extracts from their writings, is a good one, and I have been wondering if it could not be made applicable to, say some ten or a dozen more of the leaders in the great war of 1826–32. It may be difficult, in some cases, to get likenesses, but they have left behind enough of choice literature for the purpose. To carry out the idea would be attended with some expense, but there should result enough from the increased sale of the numbers thus enriched to defray it. I would nominate, to occupy a niche among those who might be thus honored, among New York men: Wm. H. Seward, Frederick Whittlescy, Chancellor, one of Weed's associates in the Morgan investigation, who wrote the address for and Anti-masonic State Convention, at Utica, August, 1828; John C. Spencer, New York's able and incorruptible priest, who fearlessly bearded the conspirators in Western New York; Solomon Southwick, the fearless and independent editor, whose addresses and trumpet-toned editorials sent dismay among the cohorts of darkness; and Henry Dana Ward, the scholarly editor of the Anti-masonic Review. If I were to go out of New York, I would not know where to stop, but would not pass by Gov. Wm. Slade, of Vermont; John Quincy Adams, of Massachusetts; Gov. Ritner, of Pennsylvania, and the accomplished orator and historian, Wm. Wirt. The purest statesmen and best scholars of the day were in the Anti-masonic ranks, and they should not be unknown to the men of this generation. G. W. H.

JUDGE WHITNEY.

I knew the Judge. He was a faithful public officer, and could get any office in the county. His son-in-law was a great sufferer from consumption, and poor, and a Mason. He died, and his wife also died the same day, and both were buried by Masons in the same grave. The Masons allowed the Judge to care for them while sick, but when dead, they came out, dressed in full, to lay them away. I was at the funeral. The Bible was carried, with square and compass, and a veil over them—carried by one of the worst men in town.

A week or more after this I met the Judge on the sidewalk. He was a Methodist. I said, "Well, Bro. Whitney, the Masons after all have some good streaks; they buried your daughter and her husband, and of course paid all the funeral expenses." At this the Judge got very much agitated, and said, "Not a dollar. They made me fifty dollars expense more than if they had left it all to me." I know this was hard for him to pay.

My brother-in-law was a Mason of the Belvidere lodge, and faithful to his obligation, went to war and died. His widow was left with four helpless children in a very destitute condition. His pastor was a Mason, a Methodist preacher. I told him some plain truths concerning his pretended Masonic benevolence. The Masons now began to stir. They called for a county donation for the war widows and children. The farmers came with wood and provisions, and in all made a very handsome donation; in all amounting to several hundred dollars. By the way the Masons had committees appointed of which they became the sole agents. I found out that they paid but very little in any thing, but improved the occasion in giving their trumpets a certain sound as if they had done it all. Levi Kelly.

A WELCOME TESTIMONIAL.

[From a private letter to Bro. Capwell, of Dale, N. Y., from an old Abolitionist editor of Illinois.]

I have thought for a good while of writing to you, acknowleding, what I had learned from another source, my indebtedness to you for the reading of the Christian Cynosure. I had been from my youth interested in the anti-secret reform which it advocates, as well as those of the anti-slavery, anti-liquor, anti-Sabbath, and other needed reforms, which the interests of our common humanity, our country and our religion were demanding, and have been more or less actively engaged in the various means and plans presented for the prosecution of the needed work for these reforms; but as my health had been poor for three years past, I had felt obliged to dismiss the cares and labors of all matters of interest, leaving them for others whom the Lord might raise up as instruments for the accomplishment of every necessary work.

I felt that I had already on my hands more reading than I could prudently perform, but on examining the Cynosure, found it more Catholic in spirit, more general in its interests, more Scriptural in its views, more discriminating in its treatment of the evils which it would reform than such publications are apt to be, and than I had supposed this to be; so that I have felt disposed to give it more attention than I expected, even to the neglect, in a measure, of other reading.

As the Republican party had been the party of reform on the slavery question, and so signally accepted and blessed of Providence in securing that end, I had sincerely wished and hoped that it would continue to be a reform party, as affecting all the evils which were menacing our country at the present time. And when the question of a third party in the temperance movement was talked of, I felt that the Christian and temperance portion of that party should use their best endeavors to commit it to that reform as a principal issue; but as it failed to become so, I felt constrained to separate from it and vote for prohibition, although with no present prospect of securing any election. It seems to me that all true reforms are so nearly the same in principle that those who are interested in one would, if true reformers, be interested in all others according to their importance, as made known by the circumstances of the case. The moral evils of intemperance and Sabbath desecration, which show their effects more directly upon persons and practices in the communities where they exist, and will make the necessity imperative of doing something to suppress them, are more apparent to the mass of the people, than the secret lodge system and practice, whose evils consist more in controling influences and acts affecting unfavorably our republican institutions, without revealing the causes, except to such persons as are studying closely cause and effect in our politics and religion. It would seem to me, therefore, if neither of the existing parties will pledge themselves to these reforms, and a third party should be indispensible to their success, that these will have to be the more prominent issues before the people generally, together with such other moral and political evils as exist, and are affecting the public mind, being the subject of agitation in the papers of the country more or less of all parties and creeds—as information in regard to the secret lodge system is not, and will not be, until by public sentiment touching these institutions, it becomes safe to do so, without damaging their patronage.

I am glad to find the Cynosure conducted so fairly towards those involved in the evils discussed, aiming while opposing the systems to save the persons connected with them or any evil practice; since many who act as reformers are so sweeping and censorious in their communications as to repulse some who would respect faithfulness and fairness, although it should shatter the foundations upon which they are attempting to stand. Many of the agents and correspondents also appear to be quite prudent as well as able in the defense of their principles, and it seems to me to be but a question of time in regard to the triumph of the truth, as affecting the various reforms advocated by the National Christian Association. And though I may not be able to enter into the fight, I shall watch its progress with prayerful interest, and hope while I yet live to hear the shouts of victory.

I notice some very valuable publications of this society which should be widely circulated, and which, if I had the means, I should like to help to put in the hands of the many of those who do not read upon the subjects and on account of their prejudices will not furnish for themselves the needed light which aid and set them right, but I have been so long unable to earn anything that I must forego any such privileges in these reforms of doing as I did in the anti-slavery movement to the reduction of my worldly means, from which I have never recovered. But I do not say this in complaint. It was my opportunity, and I trust was acceptable and useful in advancing that cause. I hope many will feel this to be their opportunity to make sacrifices for the needed reforms of the present time and demands. E. O.

THE TEWKSBURY SCANDAL.

Governor Butler is overhauling the Tewksbury Almshouse. The Marsh family who run it, and are charged with selling dead bodies; holding funeral service over empty graves; abstracting supplies, etc., are being handled very roughly by the Grand Inspector General of the 33rd degree. His experience in New Orleans, where his own family is supposed to have helped him to a fortune in the public service, has well fitted him to explore the curious windings and involutions of this Tewksbury case. The country ought to derive some value from his New Orleans services.

But what is very remarkable is, that holding funeral services over empty graves (the supposed occupants having gone to the dissecting-house) is considered by Freemason Butler as very discreditable. We agree with him perfectly; but then, how is it about that dead Hiram? What has the General to say to that?—an imposition which he has been engaged in so many years. And then, I have known of the Grand Army decoration day services being held over supposed graves; and Freemason Butler is one of the original inventors of these decoration day services. Is it not about time that Freemason Butler himself should be overhauled? Anti-mason.

WORDS IN SEASON.

Bro. Donaldson, of Washington, is ever a bearer of good tidings like Ahimaaz. This he brings us:

"Sister Lizzie Rawls, of Philadelphia, a colored saint of God, has been at work down in North Carolina for our Father above. She has been the instrument, through our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, of saving one hundred and six precious souls, and twenty-six of them gave up their secret orders. These converts are white and colored. Sister Rawls has returned home to Philadelphia again, worn out. I think this is better than anything I have seen or heard lately. Sister Rawls is a grand worker. Bro. Dolan and myself got acquainted with her last fall in New Jersey. There is a band in Philadelphia of about thirty-five in number, men and women, and they are God's noble children. I hope in a few days to be out in the field again to work for the Master."

A (Chicago) "pedestrian," who gathers in not a few good things for our readers, makes this comment on a recent street conversation:

"The misrepresentations of the proceedings at the funeral services conducted by Pres. Blanchard over the recently deceased son of his friend, Mr. Ford, at Washington, D. C., had an illustration of the sympathy of the secret orders with each other. An Odd-fellow, a deacon of a Baptist church, rather jubilantly put before me the venomous remarks of the Inter Ocean when first published. Afterwards I shewed him the Cynosure of the 12th April, with an account of the proceedings, when to my surprise the good Deacon attempted to maintain that the reported words given Pres. B. were of the same character as those which justified the severe censure of the Inter Ocean. I wished then that an extract from that paper's article had been in the Cynosure to contract with the true report, for then the deacon could not have justified the slanders upon our worthy President. But 'Blessed are ye when men say all manner of evil against you falsely for my sake,' said our Lord."

Bro. R. W. Lyman, of Arcade, N. Y., has also had the same subject under consideration, and says:

"The enemies of the Light, which is the Son of God, have thrown down the gauntlet. Now let Bro. Blanchard, as the Gideon sent by the Lord, take it up and with his three hundred men that lap the water with their tongues, go forth for conquest, under the battle cry of 'The sword of the Lord and of Gideon.' The 'barley-bread dream has already begun to verge towards its fulfilment, as applied to Masons as such, for they are at war among themselves. In reference to the Midianites it is recorded, that, the Lord set every man's sword against his fellow, even throughout all the host. God is equally committed and engaged in the work of the overthrow of the hideous blackness of Freemasonry, as he was in that of the overthrow of the Midianites of Gideon's time; and therefore, his church militant will assuredly triumph in this conflict. The cry of defeat, of the vanquished, as God is true and his church on earth is faithful, shall ere long be appropriate as issuing from the 'House of the Temple' of Baal at Washington. For Masonry will faint, and die in the swoon."

Bro. J. S. Amidon, of Corry, Pa., writes a little late of Bro. Hinman's visit to that city. We hope this was only the beginning of much good work there. Bro. Amidon has for years held up the banner of a Christian testimony there, with few to cheer or help:

"We had quite a breeze in our quiet city when Rev. H. H. Hinman, on his way from Washington, D. C., stopped and gave us two lectures and distributed anti-secret tracts. The men of the Apron and Chain hold Bro. Hinman responsible for all they found in the tracts, and they all at once became very pious, and thought that the Rev. gentleman ought not to circulate slanderous literature, for it would drive the people away from him so that he could not do them good, if he would; that he ought to have approached the people in a way to have allayed their prejudices and disarmed their suspicion. But really the great trouble is, they want to be let alone as the devils did in the days of the Lord Jesus Christ; but perhaps that would not be best for them, nor us, nor for the cause of God and truth. I think Bro. Hinman has opened the way for more anti secret work for himself and others, if they can make it in their way to come through here. But I will say that the members of the United Brethren church did not get much credit to themselves in staying away from the lecture with all their profession of opposition to secret societies. What is profession if practice is lacking?"

OBITUARY.

The announcement of the death of the late Frank Miller, of Warsaw, N. Y., will be noted by many with more than ordinary interest. His connection with the substantial interests of Warsaw dates back to 1819, when he began a career of usefulness which has steadily increased, and now that he "sleeps" his works do follow him. Beginning in Warsaw, "an orphan and without relatives" he wrested a competency from the difficulties besetting his position and left to his children an inheritance that is better than gold. His pastor, Rev. J. E. Nassau, D.D., who knew him long and intimately has given his biography in few words, "His life was blessed and a blessing to his generation," In 1826 he began as an active opponent of the lodge and steadily maintained his opposition to the last. Putting principle above business or any worldly consideration he bore testimony in public and private against not only Freemasonry but whatever else he believed to be an offence of his Divine Master.

His early business life was associated with the beloved Isaac Preston, whose death at Lockport, Ill., occurred a few weeks ago. The two purchased a tannery and were in partnership till 1835.

His remains were committed to their quiet resting place in the cemetery of the beautiful town with which he had grown up, and from which his spirit departed to join the triumphant host, March, 27th. 1883. Another pillar of light set in the temple on high will be missed by the citizens of Warsaw and by those who visit the town to promote those reform movements which were dear to him and which he liberally sustained. J. P. S.

Thomas A. Fait died of consumption at his home in Loveland, Colo., March 13th, 1883, after an illness of three and a half years. He was born July 16th, 1838, and brought up in Hocking Co., Ohio. His parents (who still survive him) were zealous in their opposition to secrecy which left its impress on their children. The subject of this notice, while practicing medicine at Hopeville, Iowa, in 1870, was induced by a Masonic partner to join the lodge, taking two degrees in one night. He was so thoroughly disgusted with the oaths and ceremonies that he never, on any occasion, returned. Two or three years later, after reading some copies of the Cynosure handed him by a friend, he became a subscriber, re-nouneed Masonry, and was ever after a radieal reformer, warning the people, both in public and private, against the evils of Masonry. Amidst the strongest persecution of his church (Methodist Protestant), he was bold in the defense of his principles; was also active in circulating the Cynosure and other reform literature. He was a Christian from childhood, and hence prepared for a triumphant death. Many times, as he saw death approaehing, he rejoiced in Christ as a complete Saviour.

Moses Shay.

Josiah S. Browne was born in Maugerville, New Brunswick, and died in Martintown, Wis., April 2, 1883, aged 78 years and 15 days. In early manhood he embraced religion and lived a consistent disciple of Christ until the day of his death. He was the father of eight children, five of whom are still living and with his erippled wife mourn their loss, but that is his eternal gain. He engaged early in the great Anti-masonic reform and not only worked for it himself but taught his children the same. Two of his sons are in the ministry and Eld J. F. Browne is lecturing, preaching, and teaching, in Kentucky. He died of a very painful disease, but amid all his sufferings he was sustained by his ever faithful friend and Saviour.

Kind friends and neighbors proffered their services both by night and day during his siekness and also two physicians attended him, so that all was done for him that could be done. I visited him only once during his siekness, at that time he seemed to be comparatively free from pain and was able to converse freely. He was conscious of his near departure and was ready and willing to go and be with Christ. He had arranged all his worldly business so that when the message came he had only to lie down and fall asleep in Jesus, quiet and as peaceful as a little child.

Introduction.—We are now on the eve of a new era in the history of the church. For ten years the Gospel had been preached and thousands of converts had been gained. They were chiefly among the Jews, but the Gentiles had also been welcomed, if they would conform to the Jewish rites and become Jews at the same time they became Christians. Now the church was to be freed from the trammels of Jewish rites and ceremonies. A new era of missions to the Gentiles was to be inaugurated, and all nations were to be invited to Christ without becoming Jewish proselytes. "As loyal and believing Hebrews, the Jewish Christians could not contemplate the removal of Gentile disqualifications, without a distinct assurance that those enactments of the law which concerned them were abrogated by a divine legislator." The human instruments of this startling change were: (1) Paul, who had been driven from the Jewish synagogues, and directed by God to go to the Gentiles; and (2), at nearly the same time, Peter, the acknowledged head of the church at Jerusalem. How this enlargement of the church took place is the subject of the present lesson.—Peloubet.

NOTES.

"And Cornelius said," in reply to Peter's question why he had sent for him. This was in Cornelius's own house at Cæsarea. Cornelius goes on to relate the story of his vision. Four accounts are given of this vision, which should be compared together: (1) the direct narrative, (10: 1-7); (2) the account given by the messenger to Peter (10: 22); (3) Cornelius's own sccount to Peter (10: 30-32); (4) Peter's apologetic account at Jerusalem (11: 13, 14).

"Thy prayer is heard." In the actual words of the angel, "prayer" is mentioned before "alms"; whereas in the direct narrative (ver. 2), "alms" are mentioned before the "prayers."—Schaff. The angel is right. True prayer is the spirit from which true alms flow. Praying is no more opposite to good works than sunshine is opposed to fruits and flowers.—Peloubet. It must have been, in the nature of the case, a prayer for fuller light and knowledge of the truth.—Plumptre. It is to be observed further that "prayer" here is in the singular. This "prayer" was perhaps the crisis and consummation of many previous "prayers."—Schaff

As the two messengers of Cornelius were approaching Joppa about noon the next day, the Lord was preparing Peter for their reception. Peter, about noon, probably having fasted till that hour, went up upon the house-top to pray. The flat roofs of Eastern houses, to which access could be obtained from outside without passing through the rooms of the building, formed a convenient place for retirement (Cambridge Bible), and in a city like Joppa, and a house like that of the tanner, was probably the only place aecessible for such a purpose.—Plumptre. The outstretched sheet was a figure of the wide world; the four corners denoted the four quarters of the globe, to show that the whole world, North, South, East, and West, was included in the kingdom of God; and the enclosed animals showed that the Gospel was for all classes and conditions of men,—none, from the lowest to the highest, are excluded.

"God is no respecter of persons." The word used here denotes the act of showing favor to one on account of rank, family, wealth, or partiality, arising from any cause. It is explained in James 2: 1-4. It simply affirms that God will not save a man because he is a Jew, or because he is rich, or learned, or of elevated rank, or on account of external privileges; nor will he exclude a man because he is destitute of these privileges. But this does not affirm that he will not make a difference in their character, and then treat them according to their character, nor that he will not pardon whom he pleases. The doctrine may be thus stated: (1) the barrier between the Jews and Gentiles was broken down. (2) All men thus were placed on a level,—none to be saved by external privileges, none to be lost by the want of them. (3) All were guilty (Rom. 1: 2, 3,) and none had a claim on God. (4) If any were saved, it would be by God's showing mercy on such.—Barnes.

"Is aceepted with him." These words have been perverted as if they taught the superfluousness of faith in the doetrines of Christianity. It has been urged, if a man be only a good man, if he be religious and virtuous, he will be accepted by God, whatever his faith may be; it is not creed, but practice, that God requires. But evidently this is not the doctrine taught us in these words. Peter here asserts that there is no natural obstacle in the way of any one who fears God and works righteousness; that there is now no barrier such as circumcision, no external hindrance, but that all are equally aeceptable to God. As Meyer well puts it, "is accepted of him," indicates the capability in relation to God to become a Christian, but not the capability to be saved without Christ—Gloag.

Verses 38-41. Here we have an epitome of the Gospel, which is the power of God unto salvation: (1) his appointment by God as Prophet, Priest, and King; (2) his endowment with power; (3) his holy life and example, worthy of the Son of God; (4) his victory over the powers of evil; (5) the proofs of his good work and character by witnesses; (6) his atoning death; (7) his resurrection; (8) the complete proofs of his resurrection, and henee of his being the true Saviour, and of our immortality.—Peloubet.

"Judge of quiek (living) and dead." Christ is now the judge; his life and character are the standard by which every man is to judge himself; he shows what is the ideal of humanity, and so, how far we have fallen from it. He is also to be the judge, by announcing the divine judgments on the sons of men at the last day. The living and the dead are here to be taken, primarily, literally of all men, past, present, and to come; so taken, there is no objection to add, seeondarily, a spiritual meaning, and understand it to indieate both saints and sinners. Observe how both here and in chapter 17: 31, the judicial office of Christ is brought into prominenee; a phase of his character and work rarely mentioned in modern preaching. He is Judge, as well as Saviour.—Abbott.

"The Holy Ghost fell on all them which heard the word." The miracle proved that the plan of salvation which Peter announced was the divine plan, and that the faith which secured its blessings to the Jews was sufficient to secure them to the Gentile. A previous submission to the rites of Judiasm was shown to be unnecessary. It is worthy of note, too, that those who received the Spirit in this instance had not been baptized (comp. 19: 5), nor had the hands of an apostle been laid upon them (comp. 8: 17). This was an occasion when men were to be taught by an impressive example how little their acceptance with God depends on external observances.—Hackett. After this (ver. 47), they were received by baptism into the Church. The passage clearly shows that the Holy Ghost is not tied even to the most sacred divine ordinances; but it shows also the importance even of the external part of baptism, since men who had received the fullest outpouring of the Spirit were not exempted from it. It is presumption to say, "Because the form is not everything, the form is nothing."—Stock.

PROMPTINGS TO FURTHER STUDY.

Why is it not good to have respect of persons in judgment? What Old Testament declaration can you find to show that there is no respect of persons with God? What do we commit if we have respect to persons? Unto whom will God have respect; and what Old Testament passage proves it? Give a passage from the Pentateuch to show that God had regard for the Gentiles in his covenant of grace.—Scholar's Quarterly.

France Athirst for the Truth.—A sentence or two, culled from a recent letter received from one of our friends prominent in the conduct of the work of evangelization in France, and in a position to know whereof he writes, deserves to be transferred to these pages. "This land," he says, under date of Paris, December 11th last, "is thirsty for the truth. It seems from afar, perhaps, to be mad with atheism and 'free thought.' Do not be deceived by the roars you hear reaching you from across the ocean. There is of course here a set of brawlers; but they do not represent the majority of the more sedate and reflective minds. Had you seen yesterday the crowded audience listening to Father Hyacinth's earnest words of warning, or the humble people I addressed in a simple hall in this city, you would have been encouraged in the work of helping those who are endeavoring to bring this nation into full contact with the Gospel. Please do help us."—Christian World.

There are many church members who are so pitiably weak that they are constantly yielding to temptations What is the cause of this? Dr. T. L. Cuyler answers: "Starvation has reduced them to living skeletons. A Christian soul can not keep fat and strong on daily newspapers, or on the best of secular literature."

The light of truth is breaking in on a long darkened and sin cursed world, and "the unfruitful works of darkness" are hastening to their fall. Soon may it come.—Sandy Lake News.

EDITORIAL LETTERS.

WASHINGTON ITEMS.

Mr. Ingersoll, at the funeral of an infidel named Mills, made a speech which closes thus:

"What can we say of death? What can we say of the dead? Where they have gone, reason cannot go, and from thence revelation has not come.. But let us believe that over the cradle nature bends and smiles, and lovingly above the dead in benediction holds her outstretched hands."

The man who speaks thus, after denying everything but simple matter and sensation, is a hypocrite. He knows there is no "nature" which has "hands" to stretch out. He is dealing in fiction at the grave, and over the dead which is mockery and cruel insult.

In the Star Route Trials the other day Ingersoll was angered by Merrick the opposing attorney, and seized an inkstand to throw at him. Apologizing to Judge Wylie he said no man should insult him, as Merrick had, with impunity. He would resist God himself if he should attempt it, at the Day of Judgment.

A Friend Quaker here told me he was taken to Ingersoll by an acquaintance, to see what a sweet-mannered, Christian-like gentleman he was. Ingersoll was uttering oaths of common, vulgar swearing and blasphemy! The Quaker's friend was mortified, and said, "Mr. Ingersoll, what is the matter?" "I'm mad," was the only explanation he gave. Now when Mr. Ingersoll calls on "God" to "damn" men and things which anger him, he believes there is a "God" who will "damn" or not. If he does believe, he is a hypocrite. If he does not he is a vulgar buffoon. In either case is he a philosopher?

Seizing on the Dead.—The next Sabbath after the lodges broke up young Ford's funeral, they had a new funeral service without noticing or notifying the father of the dead man. The Washington Post, April 16, says of it:

"Captain Thomasson and several representative members of the Union Veteran corps attended the church service in memory of their late comrade, Charles M. Ford, which was held at the Twelfth-street southeast Methodist chapel, yesterday morning. The funeral sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Ryland, who took his text from St. Paul's address to the Thessalonians: 'But we would not have you ignorant, brethren, concerning them that fall asleep; that ye sorrow not even as the rest which have no hope,' etc."

Frank H. Cushing, (see article "Among the Zunis") who had charge of the Zuni Indians here in Washington, boarded his Indians with Mr. H. V. Colton, whose family I found here in our head-quarters. He told me long and interesting stories of the Zunis and Frank H. Cushing, their leader and guardian. I was about to write out the demon-worship of these sinking Indians, when I saw the whole detailed in the Cynosure, from the Century. Other missionaries (so-called) are sent among those decaying remnants of mortality, by our government and paid by it! They are all Masons. And the godly temperance women here get those missionaries to make prohibition speeches for them in Masonic Hall. I have heard them. Cushing married while here, and has taken his young wife into those ante-chambers of hell where he has been adopted and become a Zuni.

Frederick Douglass has a government office in the City Hall here. In his address at Dr. Rankin's church on Emancipation day, April 16, he spoke with affection of the Republican party, lamented that it was losing its "cohesive power," etc.; but yesterday he exclaimed, "What need of a new party?" I answered, "If we take out of it the 228,000 votes given to Wirt in 1832, you will have to go for favors to the Democrats whom, in your speech, you called with just satire, 'Our old friends the Democrats.'" It takes but little foresight to see that, what with prohibition and anti-secrecy, there will be a "new party" whoever likes or dislikes it.

The Washington Star contains a note on the Gougar victory. The arguments and Supreme Court decision of the Wheaton College case governed and guided the case of Purdue University and the excellent President White. Hail to the victory of Mrs. Helen M. Gougar! The lodge is after the Illinois University at Champaign. Look to it! Look carefully to it!! This is the Star's paragraph:

"The great slander suit in Lafayette, Ind., between Mrs. Helen M. Gougar, the advocate of temperance and woman suffrage, and Chief of Police Mandler, involving a charge of adultery with Captain Dewitt Wallace, a prominent Prohibitionist and Republican candidate for the State Senate last fall, resulted in a verdict for Mrs. Gougar, in the sum of $5,000.

"Let the Righteous Smite me;" and he has. Good brother Lyman of Arcade, N. Y., writes cheerily about the Washington work, and warns me not to say "we" do it, when "all the glory belongs to God." Amen.

Sabbath was an eventful day here. Good men are drawing nearer to the reform and mere worldlings who hailed my coming, now turn away the face. "They shall hate you and separate you from their company," said our blessed Saviour.

Pray.—I have not requested through the Cynosure, the prayers of God's children since coming here. I never felt more deeply the need of them. Please pray for me.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS.

Washington, D. C., April, 17, 1883.

I last night attended the emancipation celebration at Dr. Rankin's, Congregational church. Hon. Frederick Douglass spoke. I can see no falling off in his wonderful powers. His speech was replete with political wisdom, and, what was far better, with reverence for God. As the speech was written and will doubtless be published, I will attempt no account of it. Douglass is the idol of the colored people, and he gave them judicious and wise counsels throughout, and his views were statesman-like, sound and good. Though moderately Republican, he showed that that party was in a state of incipient disintegration; and he pleasantly and wittily showed up the Democratic party in its savage cruelty to the negroes, and its cringing, fawning and bidding for their votes.

I shall see Mr. Douglass and let the Cynosure know what he thinks of the American party and its platform.

THE CELEBRATED NECKER.

This remarkable personage was born in Switzerland, became a banker's clerk in Paris at the age of fifteen; married a poor but pious girl in his native Switzerland, who was possessed of great personal beauty and merit, and acquired an immense fortune.

Recommended by his integrity and talents, he became minister of finance to Louis XVI., when the French exchequer was prostrate and the country without credit. "He touched the dead corpse of the public credit and it stood up." His integrity displeased political gamblers and rings who wished to prey on the fruits of his labors. The weak monarch listened to their wishes and banished his minister. Almost a rebellion among the people forced the king to call him back. This was about 1789, when one in 250 of the whole French population were titular "nobles." The nobles and clergy were exempt from land-tax, road-taxes, the army conscription and liability to have soldiers billetted on them. In short the nobles and clergy ate the taxes; the people paid them. These privileged orders owned more than one-seventh of all the land in the kingdom which was thus exempted from public burdens, and both nobles and clergy lived (says Necker) in the most open and disgusting profligacy. The masses arose against these abominations; abolished the Bastile in 1789; beheaded their king in 1793, and guillotined their queen. Priestism and privilege produced Voltaire, Malescherbes and Rosseau. Necker was banished; Christianity abolished; the national debt repudiated; the pope crowned Bonaparte; and all ended in Waterloo, June 18, 1815. Necker died in peace at his childhood's home in Switzerland. The following aphorisms are from his book, written to stem the tide of lodge infidelity and blood:

"An innate fire languishes a long time unknown in a rough stone; that stone is struck, and we see issue out a splendid light. This is, perhaps, a faint picture of the state of the soul when death strikes off its fetters."

"The nature of the soul will always be as unknown to us as the essence of the Supreme Being; and it is one proof of its grandeur to be wrapped up in the same mysteries."

"The reason contains, in one point, the infinity of space and the immensity of time!"

"The Supreme Being, to whom all time belongs, seems to have sealed our union with futurity, by giving us foresight; placing in our heart the passionate desire of a longer duration than this life and hope of obtaining it."

"Sometimes I imagine that love, disengaging us from ourselves and transporting us beyond the limits of our being, is the first step toward an immortal nature."

"What, of all our interests, can be put in comparison with the slightest hope of pleasing the Master of a world."

"We should be miserably impoverished, if we should lose those comforts which we never possess but by the aid of our imaginations."

"It is the part of legislators, to form the august alliance which unites happiness with morality, and morality with the existence of God."

"There is a God! How is it possible to utter these words without veneration and awe? Compared with it all other thoughts are insignificant."

Our learned "Quaker Boy" in his grand article, (Cynosure, April 19) makes one mistake. He writes, "The evangelical clergy, or priesthood, if you please." Tut! tut!! A clergyman isn't a priest. See Heb. 8: 3, 4. So since Christ there are no priests but counterfeits and usurpers. But spite of this mistake "Quaker Boy's" article is resplendent.

A TOWN CLERK'S WARNING.

A friend who in quiet and retirement has studied closely the spiritual bearings of the late Sabbath uproar at a Christian funeral in Washington, suggests some thoughts which we are too apt to forget in the midst of our conflict. The vital principle, the pivot question, the real point at issue is whether the Lord Jesus Christ or Baal be God. The "town-clerk" of Ephesus made effective use of the warning that the uproar of Demetrius and his trade-union lodge of image makers might be called in question; let us see about the tumult caused by the Pythians, Grand Army and Mechanics at Washington, which has re-echoed across the whole country.

There is no doubt that the wisest of us are not beyond the deception of the devil, who would persuade all men that there is no issue of any consequence to be made against the lodge, and he is only too successful in keeping the real question out of sight. Therefore to God be the glory for interposing and overruling that the truth may be made manifest.

Now on this funeral occasion the lodges are anxious to have their rites (not the Christian) performed. On the other hand friends wish a Christian burial. They do not ask that any stay away, they do not exclude the lodges, but the lodge worship. They meet in a church dedicated to the Lord Jesus Christ; but the excluded rites are not directed to Christ, nor yet to the Father (John 5: 23: "He that knoweth not the Son, knoweth not the Father which hath sent him"); they are therefore heathen rites. Now if one of the chaplains could just have read a few selections from his lodge ritual all would have gone smoothly, no doubt. The devil would have been satisfied with a slight recognition. He once offered to give Christ all the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them for a moment's worship. But when there could be no compromise, and lodge worship is entirely excluded, and the power to which it is addressed ignored, while Christ is held up, and it is shown that he only hath abolished death, then Satan rages and he presses upon any whom he can influence to break up a peaceful meeting, and spread far and wide a lying report through the land.

How clearly is this fact seen in the lodge service which was arranged for the next Sabbath, when, in order that their services might not be disturbed, the aged parent, whose firmness for the truth had before disturbed them, was not invited. How wonderful, when we see with more clearness the number and the rage of the spiritual forces about us, do those words of Paul appear (Eph. 6: 10, 12): "Finally, my brethren, be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. Put on the whole armor of God that ye may be able to stand against the wiles of the devil. For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places."

"HOLDEN WITH CORDS."

"In human works, though labored on with pain,
A thousand movements scarce one purpose gain;
In God's one single can its end produce,
Yet still serve second to some other use."

This book resembles thus the Divine rather than the human work. Ordinary novels take the young reader over the story siccis pedibus (dry-shod) to the end of the tale; but this book teaches sound and beautiful morals from beginning to end. It warbles like a nightingale, whose first, and each succeeding note equals the close. Read, read the book, and win and woo your children to read it. The book is to be had of the publisher. Ezra A. Cook, Chicago, and at the Cynosure office.

Alexander Thomson.—If the readers of the Cynosure have one spark of "Promethean fire" in them, let them read over and over Mr. Thomson's poem, "Truth and Trick" in the Cynosure of April 19. The first stanza is an exquisite poem in itself. Read and re-read it.

—Secretary Stoddard left Chicago for the East again on Monday night. He will reach Washington after a brief stop in Ohio.

—The Century's contribution to the general understanding of the lodge system in Mr. Cushing's Zuni story, will be deeply interesting to any who are making the philosophy and origin of secretism a study. It will occur to many readers that, since Mr. Cushing is of an inquir ing mind and has joined the Zuni tribe and their secret societies for the purpose of scientific investigation, it may be possible that he has joined the Freemasons for the same purpose. To join the lodge with such an end in view is certainly more commendable than is the case with a majority of Freemasons.

—Some of our friends have had some anxiety from learning of a difficulty between brethren Starry and Rathbun, in which the former felt that he had been wronged. We are thankful that it may be said that the wrong has been righted and forgiven in a Christian spirit, and the brethren again walk in peace.

—Bro. E. Ronayne returned from Iowa last week. After the meetings in Montrose and Charlestown, he held a Bible reading every afternoon and preached every evening for two weeks in Birmingham. He also visited Lebanon and Hebrom in the same vicinity, and in the former place exemplified Masonry by publicly working the third degree. The meetings throughout were well attended.

N. C. A. BOARD MEETING.

An adjourned meeting of the N. C. A. directors was held Apr. 21st at the office of the Association. A statement was made by the General Agent and Judge Farwell of the legal status of the case of a bequest made by way of trust deed by J. G. Wright, of Ogle county, Ill., to the National Association. By this deed property was left in the hands of a trustee to be sold, and $1,000 each given to the N. C. A. and the American Missionary Association. Suit has been made to set aside this deed and the question is whether, as a compromise seems to be out of the case, the case shall be defended or no.

The business transacted was in brief approving the action of the General Agent in the Ogle county suit; approving also of his visiting Washington, and making necessary payments for improvements; also arranging for a transfer of the title of the property to the Association when full payment shall be made.

THE WASHINGTON WORK.

President Blanchard's visit to Washington has been of great value to the country and the cause of reform. His letters have everywhere been read with the deepest interest, and many have been led to investigate who were heretofore indifferent. The universally expressed wish of friends is that he might remain to gather up the facts and send them broadcast over the land. The importance of this point is coming to be better understood, and the necessity of maintaining it more generally acknowledged. Discerning men see clearly that if the movement of 1826–32 had established such a headquarters in Washington and maintained a publishing house at the capital of our nation, the country would never have fallen under the dominion of the lodge as it has. The utterances of Adams, of Sumner, of Stevens, of Seward, of Wilson, of Webster, and of the giants of those days, would have been multiplied a hundred fold, and their clear ringing testimonies would have been scattered broadcast over the land.

But these brave men had other questions with which to grapple, and having driven the conflict to a successful issue they have passed on, leaving to us a work which they had not time and strength to achieve. The pioneer and dauntless leader of the anti-lodge reform has by his commanding presence, fearless utterances, analytic mind, and pungent pen inaugurated the movement and will urge it forward with all the energy of his great soul. Whether in Washington or elsewhere, his voice will be heard and his part well done. I know of no other man who could accomplish what Pres. Blanchard has achieved during the few weeks he has been in Washington. His presence at the capital has stirred the "Stygian Pool" from Maine to California, so that the adverse press catch eagerly at any imaginary shadow of an excuse to denounce him as a base, inhuman bigot, in the hope of parrying the heavy blows already dealt and which they discern approaching in the near future. All this has been done, but it could not have been accomplished—and would not have been done—had our general had no fortress to occupy and no footing on which to stand. Pres. Blanchard will do his part and each of us must do ours. He will speak, and his voice will be heard as the voice of no other living man on this question, and we must "build the house" and furnish the "sinews of war," to shelter the cause and perpetuate the testimony and warning in the heart of our republic until the last vestige of the Secret Empire is blotted out. Friends are recognizing this fact and some have responded; others will follow, and I hope the whole will be canceled in time to hold our next national convention within three blocks of our nation's capital.

THE MORNING SUN DEBATE.

ELDER D. P. RATHBUN AND REV. F. W. EVANS DISCUSS THE MERITS AND DISMERITS OF FREEMASONRY.

Editor Cynosure:—The great debate on Freemasonry between our State lecturer, Rev. D. P. Rathbun, and Rev. F. W. Evans has closed. In some respects the contest was unequal. Mr. Evans had the advantage in eloquence and in shrewdness in taking advantage of every possible point so as to mystify and to give plausibility to his cause. He often set out in a strain of rapid speaking, uttering, a reporter said, 250 words a minute, and passing from point to point so rapidly that it was difficult for the closest listener to follow him, and at the end he would claim in a triumphant manner that he had met every argument and had demolished his opponent. Mr. Rathbun, on the other hand, was calm and deliberate, and while failing, in many cases, to show the sophistry and want of logic in his opponent, set forth the truth in a clear and convincing manner to every one who takes the Bible as the standard of faith. I am persuaded good has been done by the debate. Many of the strong points against Masonry have been presented in the hearing of men who would not come out to hear under other circumstances. These men heard not only the arguments against Masonry, but also the practical admissions that Masonry is revealed; and some, at least, are persuaded, as one who is neither an anti-secretist nor a Christian has said since, "Masonry is a pack of foolishness." The debate was conducted in a gentlemanly way on both sides. There were no personalities that could be considered offensive; no anger was manifested by either of the speakers. Excellent order was manifested by the assembled auditors, and much of the time the hall was crowded.

I will endeavor to present in this paper a brief outline of the arguments presented and positions taken by each of the speakers during the first two days, reserving the rest for a second paper. I will not take up the speeches in order, from the fact that to do so would require much repetition, as much of the ground was fought over and over again.

The leading argument of Mr. Rathbun was that Masonry professes to be a religion, and as a religion is anti-Christian. He showed how it claims to be higher than any and all the creeds and sects; that it claims to harmonize men of all faiths, that deists, Jews, Mohammedans, pagans, fire-worshippers and Christians kneel at one altar, and that the altar where all these kneel and worship in harmony cannot be a Christian altar. He affirmed that while Masonry requires a belief in God as the "Grand Architect of the universe," that the Mason's God is not the God of the Bible; that those who deny the divinity and personality of Christ are admitted to the lodge. Among them he mentioned Voltaire, and asked, Was Voltaire a Christian? He affirmed that Masonry claims to regenerate; to raise from the grave of iniquity to the faith of salvation; to save from sin; to introduce into a new life; to take by a theological ladder from earth to the grand lodge above; to admit to the Holy of Holies, etc., etc. He affirmed that Masonry professed to do all this without Jesus Christ, that it rejects Jesus Christ and permits no allusion or reference to him in any part of the rituals of Blue Lodge Masonry. He repeatedly set these things in contrast with Christianity. He supported his statements as to the claims of Masonry by many quotations from Masonic writers, such as Mackey, Oliver, Sickels, Steinbrenner, Chase, and others. He showed how those teachings conflict with Christianity by reference to such Scriptures as Jno. 14: 6; 5: 22, 23; 1 Jno. 1: 5–7; 4: 1–3; 5: 12; 2 Jno. 7; Jude 11, 12, 13, etc.

Mr. Evans in reply denied that Masonry was a religion. He admitted that Mackey and others so taught but he would not accept these authorities on that point. He tried hard to set aside Mackey. He would not permit Masonry to be judged by everything Masonic writers might say about it any more than he would permit the Christian religion to be judged by everything Christian commentators might say. He appealed to the Bible to teach Christianity, so he appealed to the ancient landmarks to teach Masonry. He denied that these teach that Masonry is a religion. His position was, that Masonry is a system of moral philosophy; that while not a religion it is in harmony with true religion; that its only religion is that in which all men agree. He emphasized this point and set forth as one of the beauties of the institution that it gathers into one fold, Christians, Jews and Mohammedans. He contended that the religion in which all men agrees cannot be anti-Christian. He quoted Mackey that "the religion of Masonry is pure theism," and said, "Pure theism is not a religion." He admitted that the name of Christ is not mentioned in Blue Lodge Masonry, yet contended that that does not prove Masonry anti-Christian since he is acknowledged in Knight Templar Masonry, and Knight Templars are sworn to espouse the Christian religion; then said Blue Lodge Masonry does not conflict with the Knight Templar degrees, therefore it cannot be anti-Christian. In further support of his position he affirmed that no Jew, Mohammedan, or pagan can become a Knight Templar. He also affirmed that the doctrine of the atonement is taught in this degree. He affirmed again that Masonry accepts the Bible as the Word of God; that the Bible is a part of the furniture of every lodge according to the 21st Landmark.

Mr. Rathbun admitted that the Bible is a part of the furniture of the lodge in Christian lands, just as the square and compass are, but proved by Chase that to require a belief in the divine authenticity of the Bible is a serious innovation in the very body of Masonry. He then showed by Mackey that Masonry does not require the Bible to be used in every land, that in a country where Judaism prevails the Old Testament is sufficient, and in Mohammedan countries the Koran might be substituted. He asked, "Is it not anti-Christian to tear the Bible in two to please the Jew? Is it not anti-Christian to put the Koran in place of it to please the Mohammedan?

Mr. Evans replied to this by saying that there is no proof that this has ever been done; that no traveler has ever reported that he found the Koran established for the Holy Scriptures in a Mohammedan lodge of Masons. As to Voltaire, he said first, that he was a believer in the Bible, but afterwards admitted that he did not believe in the inspiration of the Bible. He said Masonry does not require belief in the inspiration of the Bible, yet contended that it required belief in the Bible itself. (The nature of that belief he did not explain.) He said again of Voltaire, that he was a deist, but not atheist. In the same speech he denied that Voltaire was a Mason at all; said he belonged only to a spurious lodge which was repudiated by all English lodges.

He admitted that in the charges Masons use the gavel and other working tools to teach certain doctrines, such as regulation, satisfaction, etc., but affirmed that the tools were used only as symbols to teach the necessity of cleansing, etc. He then went to the Bible to prove that God taught by symbols, that the High Priests, the sacrifices, the blood of sacrifices, circumcision, etc., were symbolical. Since God used symbols it cannot be anti-Christian for Masons to use them. He said the blood of lambs did not take away sins, it only symbolized this, in some sense Masonic symbols do not take away sin they only symbolize the cleansing of the heart.

Mr. Rathbun asked him in reply to what Masonic symbols pointed for cleansing? He said Bible symbols all point to Christ Jesus and the blood of atonement. If Masonic symbols point to anything else save to Christ and his blood they must be anti Christian. He affirmed that Masonic benevolence is not Christian in its character. He set forth that all who are likely to become objects of charity are excluded from the lodge. Instead of saying, "Come unto me all the ends of the earth," as Christianity does, it says "Come all sound and able bodied men."

Mr. Evans admitted that Masonic charity is limited; said the Masonic lodge is not a poor house; the poor house is the only institution which cares for all the poor; churches look only after their own poor; lodges are as benvoelent as churches; have no right to take lodge funds to give to those who are not Masons; Masons as individuals are as liberal as anti-Masons, even more so; give in the lodge and give outside of the lodge. Gave instances of Masonic charity in the lodge and of large donations given by Masons outside.

Mr. Rathbun objected to Masonry as anti-Christian in that it interfered with marriage vows. Marriage is a divine institution, the parties are bound to mutual confidence; no man or body of men can lawfully come between husband and wife, yet the lodge does come between them and bad men in the lodge are made more intimate companions than the married wife. The husband spends night after night away from home until 12, 1, or 2 o'clock and refuses to tell his wife in what he has been engaged. Would he allow his wife to pursue the same course toward him?

Mr. Evans' answer to this was, that his wife might be a member of a secret society and do as he did if she wanted to. He said he never promised to tell his wife everything, and broke no marriage vow in keeping from her the secrets of Masonry. He also said that every man had secrets he never told his wife, he might be unwilling to tell everything he knew and might forget to do so; if such do not break their vows neither do Masons.

Mr. Rathbun objected again to the false assumptions of Masonry, that King Solomon, and John the Baptist, and John the Apostle were Masons. Mr. Evans admitted that these men were not speculative Masons, yet said John the divine could not have written the book of Revelation if he had not understood Masonry.

Mr. Rathbun objected to Masonry again because there are so many bad men in the lodge; said that judged by the character of its members in general it must have a bad effect on them. He illustrated by the conclave of Knight Templars which he witnessed in Chicago two years ago, which was characterized by drinking, dancing and disorder. Yet this was the Christian branch of the order. Mr. Evans' answer was that a moral order may have bad members; that at times police have been necessary to keep order at camp meetings. Not all are Israel who are of Israel. No human institution is so perfect that all its members are perfect. Church members dance as well as Masons. Masons suspend unworthy members as well as the church.

The above is an imperfect outline of the first two days' discussion. I do not claim to have given every point presented by either speaker, yet think I have given the strongest points on both sides. Considerable time was spent both of these days contending over authorities. Mr. Rathbun contending that Masonry is to be judged by the writings of its standard authors, and particularly he contended that Mackey is a standard author; Mr. Evans refusing to accept these authors only so far as suited his own ideas of Masonry. Mr. Rathbun carried the day in so far that after the first two days Mr. Evans did not dispute the authority of the books quoted, and confined himself to explaining the meaning of the language so far as possible to make it harmonize with Christianity. I will endeavor to give the account of the close of the discussion next week.

C. D. Trumbull.

The Scripture is the sun—the church is the clock whose hand points us to and whose sound tells the hours of the day. The sun we know to be sure and regularly constant in his motion; the clock may go too fast or too slow. We are wont to look at the sun to know the time of day, but where there is variation we believe the sun against the clock.

The Home.

TIRED.

Of all thy promises, O Christ,
This sometimes seems the best—
"Come to me, ye that labor,
And I will give you rest."
We get so tired, we cannot care
For many things. We creep
Like weary children near to thee,
And only pray to sleep.

We have been strong to dare and do;
We have gone forth to fight;
With force that led to victory
Have striven for the right,
Where thou hast called us we have gone,
With gladsome steps and free;
But what can worn out hearts and hands
Avail to do for thee?

We have gone forth to work among
Thy busy servants, Lord;
Oh, pleasant were the merry songs
We sang with sweet accord!
But night comes after the long day,
And we, by care opprest,
Come to thee, Master, in the dark,
And ask for leave to rest.

Oh, Jesus, thou wast weary, too,
And thou wilt understand
Why the unfinished tasks are put
From out the nerveless hand.
We thank thee for thy patient love
That gives to us its best;
We turn from all the world beside,
And come to thee for rest.

HOW TO PUT ON STRENGTH.

How, then, shall we put on strength? We answer, on our knees! No man ever puts on spiritual strength except on his knees. It was there that Jacob found it when he had "power with God and prevailed;" it was there that the apostles found it. When Peter stood forth and preached to the multitude, that day of Pentecost was the day of power; it was the Spirit's power; but how did the apostles put it on? Upon their knees; in those days of prayer; in the upper chamber in Jerusalem. Oh, brethren! it is upon our knees that the church must now put on its strength! "Awake! awake!" It is God's call. When we ourselves have risen to the consciousness of our need, we may then take hold upon God and cry, "Awake! awake, O arm of the Lord!" Let us put on the strength of the Word, as the apostle did when he shunned not to declare the whole counsel of God. Let us put on the strength of the ministry, as Paul did when he went forth in the fullness of the blessing of the Gospel of peace. Let us put on the strength of the Spirit, as the early church did when it was endued with power from on high. Then shall our work be "mighty, through God, to the pulling down of strongholds." Then shall we return from the conflict as Israel did from the pursuit of the Midianites, exclaiming, "The sword of the Lord and of Gideon!" Then shall the church be "a praise in all the earth," and men shall say, "Who is she that looketh forth as the morning, fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners?"—Dr. W. M. Paxton.

POWER OF EXAMPLE.

New converts, watching old professors, observe crooked ways; they instinctively conclude that if these do well enough acting thus, so may they; and hence they are enfeebled. Like a stream which, in its own channel, is pure, till it joins a muddy one running the same way, and gets turbid, so are young converts often hindered by those whose influence should have helped them. Pray let us not hinder those who would run well but for our faulty service. Even a watch, if wrong, may mislead a few; but a Christian is said to be a town clock, which will set many right or wrong. May we, therefore, be so regulated and kept right, that we may blessedly influence those around; remembering how human nature is apt to follow, prone to evil, and hence needs the best and safest patterns. Influence too is posthumous: it lives when we die. "Being dead, he yet speaketh," is not only true of Abel, but of Joseph, Moses, David, Stephen and Paul. See how influence lives and spreads! Gibbs wrote a book which led Baxter to Christ; Baxter wrote "The Saints' Everlasting Rest," and Doddridge was saved; Doddridge wrote "The Rise and Progress of Religion in the Soul," and Wilberforce was converted; Wilberforce wrote his "Practical View of Christianity," and the Lord blessed it to Leigh Richmond, whose "Dairyman's Daughter," and other works, have brought hundreds to God? O for the baptism of fire, the gift of the Holy Ghost, that we may be sanctified, and fitted for the Master's use.—Wesleyan Messenger.

GLEAM ACROSS THE WAVE.

Rev. Spencer Compton, the earnest evangelical minister at Boulogne, France, relates the following incident:

"During a voyage to India, I sat one dark evening in my cabin, feeling thoroughly unwell, as the sea was rising fast, and I was but a poor sailor. Suddenly the cry of 'Man overboard!' made me spring to my feet. I heard a trampling overhead, but resolved not to go on deck, lest I should interfere with the crew in their efforts to save the poor man. 'What can I do?' I asked myself, and instantly unhooking my lamp, I held it near the top of my cabin and close to my bull's eye window, that its light might shine on the sea, and as near the ship as possible. In half a minute's time I heard the joyful cry, 'It's all right, he's safe,' upon which I put my lamp in its place.

"The next day, however, I was told that my little lamp was the sole means of saving the man's life; it was only by the timely light which shone upon him that the knotted rope could be thrown so as to reach him."

Christian worker, never despond, or think there is nothing for you to do even in the dark and weary days. Looking unto Jesus, lift up your light; let it so shine that men may see; and in the bright resurrection morning, what joy to hear the "Well done!" and to know that you have unawares saved some soul from death.—Christian Herald.

NOT ASHAMED.

Justice McLean, of Ohio, heard a minister preach. He had been a skeptic, and this minister spoke to him in such a way as to convince him of the truth and necessity of the Christian religion. He was led to see how Christ had died for him, and was born again. He went home. He had hardly gotten there before he said: "We are going to have family prayer; let us go into the drawing-room and pray together."

"But," said his wife, "there are four lawyers in there; they have come to attend court. Let us go into the kitchen to have prayers." Judge McLean replied: "Its the first time I ever invited the Lord to my house and I don't propose to invite him to the kitchen by any means.

He went in to those lawyers, and said: "My friends I have found out that Jesus died on the cross for me; I have given myself to him, and now I propose to invite him to my house. You may do as you please—go or stay. But I am now to make my first prayer in my own house."

They said they would very much like to stay, and did stay. From that day Judge McLean lived a consistent Christian life.—Ex.

LIVES OF CELEBRATED WOMEN.

MARY LYON.

Near the beautiful Female Seminary at South Hadley, Mass., known and loved by noble mission workers in every portion of the globe as Mt. Holyoke, stands a beautiful Italian marble monument, with the following inscription on the west side:

MARY LYON,
the founder of Mount Holyoke Female Seminary.
For twelve years its Principal,
and
A teacher for thirty-five years,
and
Of more than three thousand pupils.
Born February 28, 1797,
Died March 5, 1849.

On the north side:

"Give her of the fruits of her hands, and let her own works praise her in the gates."

On the south side:

"Servant of God, well done,
Rest from thy loved employ;
The battle fought, the victory won,
Enter thy Master's joy."

On the east side her own noble utterance in the last instruction she gave to her school:

"There is nothing in the universe that I fear but that I shall not know all my duty, or shall fail to do it."

To sketch the life and great work of her whose dust reposes under this monument, is now our pleasant task. She was born, at the time already intimated, in Buckland, Mass., the fifth of seven children. Both her parents were noted for their piety, and her mother was also said to have had more than usual force of mind. Her father died while Mary was in her fifth year. To her mother she was, therefore, chiefly indebted for her early care and training, and how well she was prepared for the task may be seen from the following extract, written long afterward by Mary herself: "Then came the first cold winter of widowhood. How mournfully did the cheerful fire blaze in the domestic hearth, as we gathered around that bereaved family altar. What child of that household could ever forget those extraordinary prayers of the sorrowing mother for the salvation of her fatherless children, as they were offered up, day by day, through all the long cold winter? Before that mourning day again came, the eldest, while yet a child, professed to love the God of her fathers. As the remaining six were gathered in one by one, and all before they had passed the years of their youth, the mother failed not to refer to her own agonizing prayers during that first winter of her widowhood."

It was supposed from what Mary said to some of her early friends that she was the subject of a change of heart in 1816, which would be her nineteenth year, and that the instrumentality which the Holy Spirit employed was the simple explanation of Bible truth by her grand-uncle.

Soon after this she was engaged in teaching school, receiving as compensation seventy-five cents per week with board; and to prepare herself better for this work she entered the Sanderson Academy, at Ashfield, in the autumn of 1817. It was here her superior powers of mind were first manifested, and friends began to take a special interest in what they rightly judged to be a mind only needing a little polish to shine with uncommon brilliancy. The funds she had obtained from a brother, and by spinning, weaving and teaching, were soon expended, but the Trustees of the Academy, to prevent her leaving, offered her the free use of its advantages, when she took all the housekeeping materials she had gathered, and which was then common for young ladies to gather with certain objects in view, and exchanged them at a boarding-house for board.

Being thus prepared for teaching, she found no difficulty in finding employment, and when she had gathered, in her work, additional funds, in 1821, in pursuit of still higher qualifications, she entered Rev. Joseph Emerson's school, in Byfield, Mass. It was while attending this school that her religious character was more fully developed, and that she obtained boldness to witness for Christ.

She soon after this was engaged to teach in the academy which she herself had first attended, viz.: at Ashfield, and where she continued until persuaded by Miss Grant to join her in school at Londonderry, N. H. This school was not, however, held in winter, hence she taught, at the same time, in Buckland, a winter school, and when Miss Grant moved her school to Ipswich, Miss Lyon accompanied her, but still continued her independent school and God abundantly blessed her labors and gave her favor in the sight of the people. He was preparing her and preparing the people for the great work she was by and by to perform at South Hadley. But it was not all a preparatory work. She sent out numerous teachers from these schools, imbued with her unselfish spirit, and wherever they went they created an enthusiasm in behalf of education and religion, so that to have been a pupil of Miss Lyon, was considered the very best recommendation for a school. Finally, viz.: from 1830 to 1834, she gave her whole time to the Ipswich school, and while here she meditated on the establishment of such a school as Mt. Holyoke, until it became, to use her own words, "as fire in her bones." She felt that many noble minds were left, to use the figure of Gray—

"To blush unseen,
And waste their sweetness in the desert air," because of the expense attending the obtaining an education, and she determined to overcome it, and, finally, succeeded by establishing the Seminary at Mt. Holyoke, where an education could be obtained at a rate much below what was charged at similar establishments.

But it was a difficult task. The value of female education was not estimated then as it is at the present time. The country was comparatively poor, and men were not in the habit of giving large sums for any purpose, and it was a very easy matter to find an excuse against contributing to what was then only and experiment, but Miss Lyon met and surmounted all these difficulties. Her first work was to disseminate information by the circulation of a well-prepared circular, and then afterward by personal application. She had considered well the difficulty of the undertaking, but she had strong faith in the God of providence.

Nor was her trust disappointed. She was about to experience the truth of the Psalmist's declaration, "Commit thy way unto the Lord; trust also in him, and he shall bring it to pass." On September 6, 1834, a few friends, whom Miss Lyon had enlisted by correspondence, met in her parlor, and, after talking over the whole matter, appointed a committee to take steps to raise funds, etc. Miss Lyon herself went to work and raised from her lady friends one thousand dollars, to meet the outlay of carrying on the project. After awhile the question of location was settled, and Rev. Roswell Hawks secured to collect funds for the erection of buildings. With the aid of Miss Lyon, who often accompanied him in his work, some progress was made, and the corner-stone of the building was laid October 3, 1836. In the meantime she had enlisted, or rather, as she herself believed the Holy Spirit had inclined their hearts to her project, such men as Joseph Avery, of Conway; Deacon A. W. Porter, of Munson, and Deacons Safford and Williston, and in such hands there was no danger of a failure. Accordingly this now celebrated school—celebrated not only in our own land for its noble work of Christian education and the noble teachers it has supplied in almost every portion of our land, but celebrated in almost every portion of the world for the missionaries it has educated and sent out to redeem our lost race by leading them to accept and serve the only Saviour, and, we doubt not, also celebrated in heaven as the place where so many have been born into the kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ—was opened November 8, 1837, a little over three years after the little meeting in Miss Lyon's parlor at Ipswich. The peculiarities of the Seminary are so well known that we need only name them: First, there were no day scholars, all the pupils were required to room and board within its walls. Secondly, to lessen expense, and bring the cost of female education to rates that the middle classes could afford it, and to educate the young ladies in domestic matters. All the work in the building was to be performed by the teachers and pupils; and, thirdly, it was to be a school where direct and persistent efforts were to be put forth for the salvation of the souls of the pupils. And wonderful was the success it met with in all these respects. There were few years, indeed, during the period of Miss Lyon's life, when it was not visited with the special influences of the Holy Spirit, so much so that in Miss Lyon's latter years, when speaking of the death of loved ones, who studied within its walls, she could say, "I thank God that I have not yet heard of the death of any pupil of this beloved Seminary who was without a hope in Jesus." But her twelve years of busy labor soon came to an end. In February, 1849, a pupil died of erysipelas, and the whole school was very much affected by it, and Miss Lyon, at the time being not in her usual health, was specially affected, and, feeble as she was, she desired to take advantage of the condition of the loved one before the spirit had fled for the spiritual welfare of the whole school. She accordingly met with them in the hall, and, in the words of one who was present, "she wished to lead us to turn from the trying circumstances in which we were placed, and follow that dear dying one up to the 'celestial city,' and as its pearly gates open to receive her, look in and catch a glimpse of its glories. She seemed to have a most enrapturing view of heaven, and with a full heart exclaimed, 'Oh, if it were I how happy I should be to go,' but added, 'not that I would be unclothed while I can do anything for you, my dear children.'"

It was in this address that she uttered the noble sentiment which is written on her tombstone. The time at which she too should hear the welcome voice, "Come up higher," was only a few days further off, and her busy brain ceased its earthly work. The same disease that had taken her pupil called her away, but it was to a Saviour she loved, and to a heaven she longed for, and now her body awaits the resurrection of the just in the ground of the Seminary, the child of special labor and prayers.—Christian Press.

IT'S ALL THE LITTLE BOOK.

Something more than a year ago, as the writer was sitting in a railway carriage, a pleasant voice sang out:

"Paper, sir; paper, sir; morning paper, lady?"

There was nothing new in the words, nothing new to see a small boy with a package of papers under his arm; but the voice, so low and musical—it's clear, pure tones mellow as a flute, tender as only love and sorrow could make them—called up hallowed memories. One look at the large, brown eyes, the broad forehead, the mass of nutbrown curls, the pinched and hollow cheeks, and his history was known.

"What is your name, my boy?" I asked, as, half-blind with tears, I reached out my hand for a paper.

"Johnny ———;" the last name I did not catch.

"Can you read?"

"Oh, yes; I've been to school a little," said Johnny, glancing out of the window to see if there was need of haste.

I had a little brother once whose name was Johnny. He had the same brown hair, and tender, loving eyes; and perhaps it was on this account I felt very much disposed to throw my arms around Johnny's neck, and to kiss him on his thin cheek. There was something pure about the child, standing modestly there in his patched clothes and little, half-worn shoes, his collar coarse, but spotlessly white, his hands clean and beautifully molded. A long, shrill whistle, however, with another, short and peremptory, and Johnny must be off. There was nothing to choose; my little Testament, with its neat binding and pretty steel clasp, was in Johnny's hand.

"You will read it, Johnny?"

"I will, lady; I will."

There was a moment—we were off. I strained my eyes out of the window after Johnny, but I did not see him; and, shutting them, I dreamed what there was in store for him—not forgetting His love and care for the destitute, tender-voiced boy.

A month since I made the same journey and passed over the same railroad. Halting for a moment's respite at one of the many places on the way, what was my surprise to see the same boy—taller, healthier, with the same calm eyes and pure voice.

"I've thought of you, lady," he said; "I wanted to tell you it's all the little book."

"What's all the little book, Johnny?"

"The little book has done it all. I carried it home and father read it. He was out of work then, and mother cried over it. At first I thought it was a wicked book to make them feel so bad; but the more they read it the more they cried, and it's all been different since. It's all the little book; we live in a better house now, and father don't drink, and mother says 'twill be all right again."

Dear little Johnny, he had to talk so fast; but his eyes were bright and sparkling, and his brown face all aglow.

"I'm not selling many papers now, and father says maybe I can go to school this winter."

Never did I so crave a moment of time. But now the train was in motion. Johnny lingered as long as prudence would allow.

"It's all the little book," sounded in my ear; the little book that told of Jesus and his love for poor, perishing men. What a change! A comfortable home; the man no more a slave to strong drink. Hope was in the hearts of the parents; health mantled the cheeks of the children. No wonder Johnny's words came brokenly! From the gloom of despair to a world of light; from being poor and friendless, the little book told them of One mighty to save, the very Friend they needed, the precious Elder Brother, with a heart all love, all tenderness.

Would that all the Johnnys who sell papers, the fathers that drink, and mothers that weep over the ruins of once-happy homes, took to their wretched dwelling the little book that tells of Jesus and his love! And not only these, but all the Johnnys that have no parents, living in cellars, and sleeping in filth and wretchedness—would that they could learn from this little book what a friend they have in Jesus.—Appeal.

BAND OF HOPE BIBLE LESSON.

ANCIENT EXAMPLES OF THE FALSE RELIGION.

Golden Text.—Righteousness exalteth a nation but sin is a reproach to any people.—Prov. 14: 34.

Ques. 1. What is the subject of this lesson?

2. Repeat the Golden Text.

3. Were the Jews obedient to God's laws? Ans. No; they kept backsliding into idolatry.

4. What is the first instance of their worshiping other gods? Ex. 32: 1–7.

5. Why did Aaron proclaim a feast of the Lord? Ex. 32: 5. Ans. He wanted to mingle as much of the true worship with the false as he could so as to soothe his conscience by making it not appear quite so much like idolatry.

6. Is false religion always the most dangerous when it bears an outside resemblance to the true? Ans. It is; just as a counterfeit coin is the most dangerous the more nearly it resembles the genuine.

7. What is the history of the Jewish nation after the death of Joshua till the time of the kings? Judges 2: 11–19.

8. What did Jeroboam do a number of centuries later? 1 Kings 12: 28, 29.

9. Why did Aaron and Jeroboam both set up golden calves? Ans. As a symbol of Osiris, the sun, which was worshiped in Egypt under the form of an ox.

10. What do we learn from this? Ans. That the Israelites were continually going back to the old sun worship from which Abraham was called to come out.

11. What did another king of Israel do? 1 Kings 16: 32, 33.

12. What was the worship of Baal? Ans. Similar to that of the golden calves. It was the worship of the sun, the life-giving principle of nature, and the most ancient form of idolatry.

13. What are we told about Jeroboam? 1 Kings 14: 16.

14. If our rulers do not fear God what will be the effect on the people? Ps. 12: 8; Prov. 29: 2.

15. What did the Lord threaten to do to Israel if they disobeyed him? Deut. 28: 36.

16. Was this threatening fulfilled? 2 Kings 25: 8–12.

17. Are there facts in the history of our country which show that God has a peculiar care for us? Ans. Our whole history as a nation from the landing of the Pilgrims down to the present day is full of wonderful illustrations of God's guiding hand.

18. If we refuse to serve him can we hope to escape punishment any more than did his ancient people?

19. What practical truths do we draw from this lesson?

That a mingling of the true religion with the false is the most dangerous and corrupting of any kind of false worship.

That human beings are prone to idolatry.

That wicked rulers make the people they govern wicked.

That God will punish the nation that refuses to serve him.

LESSON STORY.

There is an incident told of George Washington which illustrates his habit of constant dependence on God for protection and success during the trying period of our revolutionary struggle.

A neighbor of his who was a strong Tory and had always predicted a speedy and ignominious failure for the American armies, once overheard the General engaged in solemn prayer to God for his blessing on the colonies in their war for Independence. From that time he ceased his predictions of defeat and disaster, saying, "That an army with such a man for its commander-in-chief must conquer." History has many times proved the truth that God is with that nation whose rulers are men that fear and honor him.

The boy of to-day may not twenty years hence be President or even Governor, but he will hold a very important office, for he will be one to elect presidents and governors. And whether our future rulers shall be good and true men, ruling in the fear of God, or unscrupulous, ambitious, wicked men, dishonoring God and disgracing their country, depends very much on the boys who will be voters twenty years from now. "The boy is father of the man," and men who drink and smoke, who join secret societies, profane's God's name, and have no regard for the Sabbath will be likely to choose rulers like themselves.

We will never have civil service reform worthy of the name while secret societies exert the influence they now do over politicians, political parties, and the various departments of the government service.—Evangelical Repository.

TEMPERANCE.

GEORGE W. CLARK'S LECTURE ON TOBACCO.

George W. Clark spoke last Sunday evening in the M. E. church parlors on Tobacco and Its Effects. The speaker opened the service by prayer followed by a song and a scriptural reading. After asking the privilege of sitting down while addressing the audience he proceeded to say that the frivolous use of this Indian weed is most irrational, illogical, unphysiological, whether chewed snuffed or smoked. It is a perversion of manhood and no valid reason can be given to justify or excuse this habit or mania of tobacco using. Nicotine contains no nutriment, supplies no waste or want of the physical system. It neither antidotes disease nor aids the intellectual powers. It is no friend to moral purity nor religious spirituality and on no rational theory can its use be excused. I do not say it is good for nothing, for it is an active poison, and may be used successfully as an exterminator of flies, moths, bugs, ticks, etc., and is an infallible remedy for lice on lousy cattle, and for killing fleas on dogs. Give it its due. Doctors administer it to prostrate the forces in men and animals and it does it most effectually. So poisonous is it that one dram of nicotine is equal to the same amount of prussic acid. The smallest drop it is possible to hold on the head of a pin when placed on the nose of a mouse will throw it into paralysis and kill it in less than no time. The refuse of a quid after the juice has been extracted, if swallowed by the habitual user of the weed would make him sicker than the whale was when he tossed Jonah on dry land. It contains the very breath of disease, and produces blindness, deafness, rheumatism, idiocy, apoplexy, paralysis and a thousand other ills. Cases of violent death from tobacco paralysis are becoming alarmingly frequent, and a large per cent of the sudden deaths now occurring are attributable either directly or indirectly to the use of tobacco. Cancers on the lips and mouth are becoming more frequent every day. Many a poor sickly woman who is supposed to be dying of consumption is in reality pining away from the effects of inhaling her sweet husband's tobacco breath. Tobacco throws off two of the most deadly gasses known, viz: carbonic oxyde and carbonic acid gas, and few husbands and fathers realize how they are endangering the health and lives of their children and wives by filling their homes, their offices and stores with this poison smoke. Men on the street go puffing it into the face of the lady with whom they are riding or walking. What would they think of a lady who would be guilty of such a breach of manners?

Another evidence that it is not fit to use is that it makes every one deathly sick when they first begin using it. The speaker referred to his own experience and thanked God that he had been led to stop its use before it had become a confirmed habit. It creates a thirst for strong drink by exhausting the saliva which was placed in the mouth to assist digestion. Not every one who uses tobacco becomes addicted to strong drink, but many of them do. It is acknowledged that not many of our women die suddenly and not many of them use tobacco. The southern women have a most disgusting habit of "dipping," and one house in New York manufactures, it is said, one hundred barrels of the strongest kind of Scotch snuff a month especially for this southern trade; but as a rule women do not use tobacco in any form. Why should our animal economy which naturally revolts at the use of it be subjected to such violations? Man has no right to entail on his offspring the evil effects consequent upon its use. We should never forget that inexorable law of retribution, "The iniquity of the fathers shall be visited upon the children to the third and fourth generation." It brings young men and boys into bad company. Smoking, drinking, rowdyism and crime are almost inseperable. Take a drink and take a cigar are synonymous terms. The wooden Indian with his handful of wooden cigars, and the bloated Bacchus grinning over his favorite glass go hand in hand and stand side by side on every business street. You seldom find a man who argues that the use of tobacco does any good. Nicotine feeds disease instead of healing it. It reduces its dupes to the most abject slavery. Alcohol victims are not more firmly bound. Many is the man who has endeavored to break off the habit and found it impossible. The speaker advised the boys to let it alone, and remarked that it was not necessary to caution the girls, which showed that he was not as well posted about the girls as he was fifty years ago, for it is a fact that too many of the girls of to-day know the taste of cigarettes. The speaker was obliged to close his discourse rather abruptly as his time was up, and after another song the meeting closed.—Danville Advertiser.

THE CAVE OF INIQUITY.

A man who is sunk in the darkness at the further end of a cave, may see by the light of day that is effused into the entrance, all who enter therein; their motions; what they do, etc., while they, on their part, can see nothing.

So it is with the man who is sunk in the darkness and iniquity of the Masonic lodge. He can see clearly by the light of heaven all the honest, unsuspecting men who walk in the light; can watch their motions; speculate upon their failings, and pierce them with the hidden shaft of scandal, outrage and falsehood, while he, the vilest of wretches escapes with impunity. OUST-HIM-OUT.

The Czar has signed a decree abolishing all secret societies in Russia. The time is coming when other governments will be compelled to adopt measures for their own protection against the machinations of these organizations, which have no right to exist under any government.

NEW BOOKS.

The Good Templar lodges have at length begun the work of publishing temperance literature and the first book, "The People against the Liquor Traffic," has been issued by their committee through its agent, Rev. A. J. Jutkins, late presiding elder of the M. E. churches in Chicago and vicinity. The volume contains a number of addresses by John B. Finch, of Nebraska, a young and earnest advocate of temperance and Good Templarism. In spite of a boundless self-conceit, Mr. Finch is attractive and eloquent, and his services have been in great demand in the West. His six lectures are more attractive for the general reader than the vast majority of such addresses through their diversity of argument and anecdote, and they are supplemented by three lectures, entitled "Are Liquor-dealers entitled to Indemnity," "Loyalty to Law" and "Practicability of the movement proved by its Success." Mr. Finch does not forget to use his opportunity of calling attention to the Good Templar lodge; but he does this in order to make the false impression that this secret order is the backbone of the temperance movement.

To the Ancient Classics series of the Elzevir library, which began with Trollope's Cæsar, have been added Cicero and Herodotus. As it is the design of these works to present to English readers only so much of the life and works of these great historical names as shall give them a fair insight into the character and history of the subject, of the times in which he lived and of his literary works, they are not of large compass, but present in very convenient form all the essential particulars. The life of Cicero is by Rev. W. L. Collins, who beside a fine admiration for the statemanship and oratorical power of the great Roman, appreciates quite fully his failings also, and the political and social character of his times. In addition to the biography of Cicero, his voluminous correspondence, his essays, his philosophy and his religion are treated with much freedom and fairness, judicious translations from his writings giving the careful reader an excellent knowledge of one who must be regarded as among the greatest men of the ancient republic.

The volume on Herodotus opens to many readers the treasures that are locked up in a dead language to the multitude. Little is known of the life of the "father of history," and he would be forgotten but for his skill in making the lives of other men immortal. This work is therefore an extended review of his writings, an English epitome of them of a most interesting and instructive character, and few will find any history of modern times more so. These books are sold at the remarkable price of 30 cents per volume in cloth, well printed and of about 170 pages each.

The North American Review for May is unusually timely in its discussions of topics prominent in the public mind. Senator John T. Morgan writes of "Mexico," and sets forth the considerations of commercial advantage and international comity which are rapidly bringing about a more cordial understanding between that country and the United States. The Rev. William Kirkus, taking occasion from Bishop McQuaid's charges respecting the decay of Protestantism, makes a vigorous counter charge upon the papal system in an article entitled "The Disintegration of Romanism." In "Emerson and Carlyle," Edwin P. Whipple discourses with all his old-time keenness of psychological insight and perfection of literary form upon the strangely diverse mental and moral characteristics of those two great thinkers. Prof. Felix Adler offers "A Secular View of Moral Training," arguing that the current skeptical habit of thought demands an independent system of practical ethics, based primarily on observation rather than on revelation. "Communism in America," by Prof. Alexander Winchell, gives very forcible expression to the apprehensions of those pessimistic observers of the trend of events in this country who think that they see in our political and social development all the signs of impending national decay. The other articles are "Affinities of Buddhism and Chrisianity," by the Rev. Dr. James Freeman Clarke; "Woman as an Inventor," by Matilda Joslyn Gage; "College Endowments," by Rossiter Johnson; and "Extradition," by A. G. Sedgwick, —Mr. Moody, the Evangelist, with his family, sails for America April 24. He expects to hold a conference of prominent Christian workers at Northfield, Mass., in August.

THE CHURCHES.

—Rev. A. J. Chittenden of Rockford, Ill., was on Thursday evening extended a call to the pulpit of the College Church, Wheaton; Pres. C. A. Blanchard after a very successful service of five years having resigned that he may give attention to duties demanded by the College abroad. The church is highly favored in that, while sorely regretting the necessity of a change, they have secured the aid of a brother of recognized and fine ability, and an earnest reformer who has not been without his own experiences in this war for Christ against the lodge foe.

—The United Presbyterian churches are showing a noble enthusiasm in raising their Quarter-centennial fund. Reports from individual churches read like revival times.

—The Virginia United Brethren conference adopted a very sweeping resolution against all papers that "criticise the legal actions of the constitution authorities of the church." The brethren did not perhaps notice that this sounds as if they wanted to vote somebody infallible. They ought by all means to candidly read the Richmond Star and United Brethren in Christ between this time and the next conference.

—The New York Witness says: "We deem it a duty to notify our readers that the Rev. P. A. Seguin, who has so often been permitted to use our columns in advocacy of his work as an expriest among the French, is unworthy of confidence." Mr. Seguin has also written freely in the Cynosure of his work in New York. It is no pleasure to note his fall.

—Their has been a time of refreshing at Brockport, N. Y., in which, thus far, two hundred and thirty-two souls have found peace and joy in believing and have become new creatures in Christ. There has been preaching by a Mr. Davidson, an Evangelist.

—Revivals continue to be reported from various parts of France. Among the latest is that in the Cevennes, called the Sinai of France, from the fact that the ancient Huguenots fled to this region of basaltic mountains, there to have the priviledge of worshiping God as they pleased. The meetings are described as most enthusiastic.

—Messrs. Moody and Sankey met with their usual success when at Leeds and Manchester, England. Extensive preparations were made at Leeds. The coliseum seated four thousand people. Deputations visited all the workshops and invited all the workmen to attend the meetings; the result of the effort was crowded meetings every morning. Woman's meetings were held in the afternoon, and the evening meetings were devoted to men.

—There is a wonderful revival of religion taking place at Adana, one of the most important cities in the old kingdom of Cilicia, Asia Minor, The American missionaries have been laboring prayerfully for many years in this great Turkish city with varying success, and now the harvest time has come.

—Mr. Walter C. Jones, who, nine years ago, gave the English Church Missionary Society $360,000 for a work in China and Japan, has recently made a thank-offering of $400,000 for the recovery of his son from sickness. Four years ago he gave $175.000 to found the Indian Native Church Missionary Fund.

—Major C. H. Malan died at London some months ago. He was born in 1837, and that in the assault before Sebastopol, while hardly more than a boy, his body was pierced with five bullets. Afterwards his regiment served in India and in Africa, and it was while doing duty as a military officer in Africa that he was specially impressed with the woes of the people and the need of more wide-spread efforts to give them the gospel. He resigned his commission and gave himself thereafter to labors for the Dark Continent. It was to plead for Africa that he came to the United States in 1878. He spent largely of his private fortune in establishing mission work, chiefly among the Galeka Kaffirs. His special scheme had reference to the sending of native evangelists to the interior of the continent. It was a saintly life he lived, and Africa has lost a true friend by his death.—Missionary Herald.

—A conference of all the Protestant missionaries in Japan will begin on April 16, for the purpose of discussing methods for missionary work. The conference is to be held in Osaka. The Japanese Christians are to have a general conference at Tokio the following week. The Doshish, an English school of Kioto, of which the Rev. Joseph H. Neesima is President, now has 150 students. Of these nineteen are in the English Theological Department, seven in the Vernacular Theological Department, and the remainder in the Academical Department. The course of the two Theological Departments covers three years, and that of the Academical Department five years. The older students of this school occasionally hold meetings in the city, which are attended by audiences of from 500 to 900. On the 3d of February such a meeting was held in the same hall in which Joseph Cook spoke last summer. Fully 600 were in attendance.

—Baboo Keshub Chunder Sen announces in the last number of the New Dispensation his intention of going on a pilgrimage round the globe. He affirms that he has received a divine command to go. "I feel commanded," he says, "to go on a pilgrimage to the uttermost parts of the great West," and quotes St. Paul to show that a necessity is laid upon him to go.

THE BIBLE SOCIETY'S WORK.

The important work undertaken by the Board of managers of the American Bible society, the re-supply of the whole of the United States with the scriptures, involved a large amount of preliminary labor, both on the part of the various committees and the officers of the society. The most efficient methods for the accomplishment of this work had to be considered, and the field districted so as to obtain the best possible results. Plans had to be submitted to the board for their approval and adoption, so that while the ordinary work of the society was being prosecuted as usual for the first five months of the present fiscal year, it was not till September that this special work was fully inaugurated. Many of the auxiliaries to which circulars were sent in June, 1882, are now engaged in the canvass of their fields with very encouraging results. Reports have already been received from some of these auxiliaries, showing that by their agents and volunteer workers 111,906 families have been visited; 14,535 of these were without the Bible, and 8,104 were supplied; besides 6,944 destitute individuals.

From Sept. 1, 1882, to March 1, 1883, 270 colporteurs have been commissioned by the board to labor in twenty-five States and three Territories. Twenty-six of these colporteurs have already retired from the work. Twenty-one counties have been reported as thoroughly canvassed.

From the beginning of the present fiscal year to Jan. 31, the colporteurs have visited 288,718 families. Of these 45,034 were found without a complete copy of the Scriptures in their homes, and 35,242 of them were supplied by sale or gift, besides 19,996 destitute individuals; 125,810 copies of Scriptures were sold, of the value of $46,521,76, and 37,339 donated, of the value of $9,096.41; making a total of 163,159 copies, the value of the same being $55,-618,17. The salaries and expenses of the colporteurs have amounted to $40,321.66. It thus cost the society a little less than 14 cents for every family visited, and about 24 cents for every copy of the Scriptures put in circulation. The work in the Territories were the population is very sparse has very much increased the ratio of expenditure.

SELF-SUPPORTING NATIVE CHURCHES IN INDIA.

In the late Decennial Conference in India, Rev. A. V. Timpany of the Baptist Mission, Coconada, spoke as follows on this interesting theme:

Our native Christians are just what we have made them. Other things being equal no people are more charitable than the Hindoos. When Hindoo Christians realize that the men who teach their children and lead them in divine things need their help, according to their ability they will give it. As to pastoral support, modes of living and dress different from those of the people over whom a man is pastor cut at the root of the pastoral relation. On this account I have never yet seen a missionary who could be a real pastor for a Hindoo congregation. If the principle thus indicated be kept in view, any fifty native Christians can support a pastor suitable to their wants. Various methods may be followed to develope the benevolence of the converts, but they must all spring from the fixed, dogged determination that every church member must contribute something to the general commonwealth, or must be so poor as to be helped from the church funds. Those members who are neither hot nor cold may well be spued out. In my station the first Sabbath of every month the service is mainly a giving service. The names are called and the gifts are brought and laid upon the church table. The short service that follows bears upon some phase of Christian giving. A fellow missionary has a collection-box for every village. Each Sabbath the head man brings it to the service, and they pray and give. Other missionaries, again, take gifts of grain. This principle is Scriptural in two ways: it is commanded—"Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him in store;" and it is commended—Thy prayers and thine alms are come up as a memorial before God." The Hindoos are thoroughly amenable to public opinion—the one good result, pernaps, of their caste-system. So only let the Christians feel that it is the right thing to give, and a mean, Lord-denying thing not to give, and the great question of church life and growth is settled. Another thought—my experience is that Christians who can be induced to honor the Lord's day will give and work for him who rose the first day of the week.

There are some difficulties in the way of this plan:

1. The plea of poverty. Missionaries are more influenced by this than is good for the converts. If people do not give out of their poverty, they will not out of their riches.

2. The very general opinion that if enough pressure is brought to bear on the mission bag. rupees will come out. Three-fourths of our workers think that we could as well as not give them better pay.

3. The great apparent disparity between the living of a missionary and that of the converts. The disparity is not real, but appearances are against the missionary.

To these difficulties we must do as Nelson did to the signal to cease firing,—turn our blind eye to them. The Tract Societies could help us in no way more than by getting out a number of plain, crisp, short tracts on giving and working, like the famous sermon of Blind Yohannes or "John Concordance" on "Tithes." Missionaries of one society should refuse to entertain the workers of another, unless it be a clear case of conscience and not of better pay. My first mission field was in the Nellore District. At the end of six years there were between seven and eight hundred communicants, and ten village schoolhouse chapels were completed, and twelve more were in building. The central church gave a door, a window, and five rupees to each house. That was all the outside help each village received. The heathen caste people in most villages gave help in timber and thatch. There were schools, but no teacher received more than two rupees a month. The preachers certainly did not live on what I gave them. The village people gave and the work grew. I have not written from theory, but from more than fifteen years' observation and practice. I know that Indian Christians will give out of their poverty.

VARIETIES.

—The tallest man in the United States lives in Texas and his name is Henry Clay Thurston. He lacks four inches of being eight feet high and has never been to a circus.

—A New Yorker has been fined $300 for giving tobacco to a giraffe in Central Park. Yet a man who sells whisky to children in Chicago is only fined $5. The morals of the giraffe must be protected even if the children do go wro ng.

—The tunnel under the English Channel has been finished to a mile and a quarter of the French coast, and the engineers promise to have cars running through it within two years. The fishes in the channel will be deprived of a great deal of food when this tunnel is finished.

--Madrid has received the title of the classic home of consumption. It is said that last year 1,000 persons died there from this disease alone. The frequent sudden and violent changes of temperature cause a host of pulmonary complaints, while the number of victims to the zymotic diseases seems to show that the city is no better drained than it should be.

—One of the industries of Australia is the cooking and canning of rabbits, which are so plentiful in some districts that whole crops are sometimes destroyed by them. One firm during the last season, which lasted twenty-five weeks, cann d six hundred and twenty-five thousand of the animals.

—A widow named Callahan is the largest sheep owner in Texas. Her flocks number more than 50,000 head. Her ranges are in Uvalde and Bandera counties, in the southwestern part of the State. The sheep, a cross between the hardy Mexican variety and the Vermont merino, are divided into flocks of two thousand head each, with a "bossero" and two "pastoras" in charge of each flock.

—A party of gentlemen have just returned from New York and Cleveland, cespectively, having gone to these two rities at an appointed time to make a test of Dr. Baxter's long-speaking telephone. This is an instrument invented by Baxter, a brother of the Medical Purveyor of the army. They report that the test was perfectly satisfactory, and that they conversed by this telephone when separated at a distance of 750 miles with the same ease and distinctness as in the case of an ordinary local telephone. This is the first successful attempt to use the telephone over so long a distance. It is reported that the Western Union Telegraph Company is about to purchase the patent.

—A recent report contained the following statement as to the percentage of murders to population in eight cities: Brooklyn, one to every 47,244. Philadelphia, one to every 40,000. Boston, one to every 36,253. Chicago, one to every 22,400. New York, one to every 21,932. Baltimore, one to every 21,546. Cincinnati, one to every 12,756. San Francisco, one to every 8,709.

—If one is keeping a scrap-book of odd sayings this item will do to add to the collection: A Scotch minister, forgetting his spectacles, could not read the hymn, so he said, "My eyes are dim; I cannot see." The precentor immediately sang, "My eyes are deem; I caw-noot see." The minister explained, "I spoke of my infirmity." This was sung as the second line. The minister pleaded, "I merely said my eyes were dim." These words were sung, and he sat down, saying, "I did not mean to sing a hymn." When this line was sung the services closed.

— We have in our town a colored man who is as much of a prodigy as the veritable "Blind Tom." His name is Zach Taylor, born in Carteret county, of parents who were slaves, is 33 years of age, never went to school in his life, and yet he can build a mill, repair a watch, tune a piano, or print a newspaper. The most remarkable gift he has, however, is the ability to repeat Scripture, which he can do for hours at a time without making a mistake. There isn't his equal in North Carolina, or in the South, for that matter. —Beaufort Telephone.

—A recently published statement in regard to repudiated State bonds puts down eleven States in the list of repudiation as follows: Virginia has reduced its debts by repudiation $18,000,000; Tennessee, $16,178,000; South Carolina, $17,697,000; North Carolina, $26,280,000; Mississippi, $2,847,000; Louisiana, $27,780,000; Kentucky, $3,712,000; Georgia, $19,863,000; Florida, $3,121,000; Arkansas, $12,474,000: Alabama, $4,139,000. Here we have a grand total of $152,091,000. Virtually, then, the United States Supreme Court has passed adversely upon a claim involving over one hundred and fifty millions of dollars, and the worst of it all is that the decision must be accepted as sound law, and there is no hope of remedy through another amendment to the Constitution.

Two-cent postage was not the only good thing accomplished by Congress in connection with the postal service. Another was a greatly needed improvement in the money-order system. When the act takes effect next fall any post-office can sell (for a fee of 3 cents) a "postal note" for any sum up to $4.99, payable to bearer at any post-office. The blank note will contain columns of figures representing dollars, cents, year, month, day of month, etc. Holes will be punched by the postmaster issuing the note in these columns, showing the date of issue and the exact amount, including odd cents.

FEVER and AGUE

Or CHILLS and FEVER.

AND ALL MALARIAL DISEASES.

The proprietor of this celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE, CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. He refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to cure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and whole families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the general health. It is, however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medicine will not require any aid to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

The genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN J. SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP, of Louisville, Ky. Examine well the label on each bottle. If my private stamp is not on each bottle do not purchase, or you will be deceived.

FARM MAXIMS.

1. Keep up with improvements.
2. Think that small things are important.
3. Take pleasure in your work.
4. Don't ruin stock by low fencing or bad feeding.
5. Don't let your fences sag or fall down.
6. Don't let your fowls roost in the trees.
7. Have your stock well sheltered.
8. Don't leave your wagons, your tools or farm implements exposed to the weather.
9. Don't hang harness in the dust, and never forget to oil axles.
10. Never go to town without business.
11. Don't be stingy and penurious, but practice old-fashioned, honest and honorable economy.—Sel.

Close Loading.—To draw a load on a sand road requires a power equal to one-fifth the weight of the load; an ordinary earth or dirt road reduces this, approximately one-half, while a clay bed road again reduces a half; good cobbles require a thirtieth equivalent, while American Belgian blocks necessitate a fortieth. Asphalt is calculated as requiring one hundred and fortieth, while the leverage on an ordinary railroad is but one two hundreth. Reducing this to practical horse power, one horse, on an ordinary rail, can draw a wagon weight that would require the power of twenty horses over a common dirt road, and of forty through a Jersey sand path. This simple proportion is a valuable guide in close loading.—Iron.

Heavy Farm Tools.—As a general thing, says a sensible writer, all of our farm tools are too heavy. Generally speaking, the farm wagon that will bear up under a ton weight with ease, is plenty heavy enough for all practical purposes to which a farm wagon should be put. If you want to haul two tons, it is far better and cheaper in the end to make two loads of it. The saving in horseflesh and feed will, in a few years, amount to enough to buy a new one and have something left for profit. If you are about ordering a new wagon, have it made light and of the best material, and you will never regret it.

Grafting Wax.– A writer in Purdy's Fruit Recorder furnishes this recipe: Take one pound of resin, one ounce of beef tallow, one ounce bees wax, and melt and stir together thoroughly. Remove from the fire and add seven ounces of alcohol and one tablespoonful of spirits of turpentine. Stir until entirely cold. Bottle air-tight in a large mouthed bottle. Apply with a brush.

Bean Meal for Cows.—A writes says that he has never failed to cure garget by the use of beans. He feeds one pint of bean meal, mixed with other meal, for four successive days, and has found that quantity sufficient to cure the worst cases. He thinks if cows were fed with bean meal several times a year they would never be troubled with garget.

Small Fruits Most Profitable — A fruit grower who has had considerable experience in the business, says that small fruits, as an average, such as strawberries, raspberries, blackberries, currants, grapes, etc., yield, as a rule, double the profit of apples, pears, peaches and plums, for the reason, principally, that small fruits come immediately into bearing, and produce every year. Priees are more equal from year to year, varying less than apples and pears.

To Grow Strawberries Successfully.—1. Select good soil. 2. Give it thorough mechanical preparation. 3. Drain so that there will be no pools of water, especially in winter. 4. Provide liberal fertilization. 5. Make judicious selection of the varieties to be cultivated. 6. Irrigate freely, especially in the time of a drouth. 7. Keep all runners cut. 8. Frequent fertilization after the fruiting season. 9. Mulch them after the ground is frozen.

CLOSE PRUNING FOR SMALL FRUITS.

The importance of thinning canes, and shortening in the wood of the small fruits, is not generally understood by the average farmer. He thinks he has done his duty when he has planted his currant bushes and raspberries under the wall or fence and left them to the rivalry of weeds and their own suckers. His grape vine climbs an apple tree, or the trellis on the side of the barn, without much pruning, and he blames the nurseryman for imposing upon him with worthless varieties of fruit. Let him apply the knife to the grape vine, cutting back all the new wood to two eyes, after the vine has covered his trellis, and he will see clusters to rejoice his vision and palate. Only four canes to the stool should be left for the raspberry, and treat other shoots as weeds. Even the canes that are left to grow, after the old ones have finished bearing and are cut away, should have their branches shortened in, by thumb pruning, to give the best results. Manure your currant bushes with ashes; keep down the worms with white hellebore, cut out one-third of the wood every season, and even the old Red Dutch currant will surprise you with its fine fruit.—American Agriculturist for May.

HOW TO MAKE THE GARDEN PAY.

The garden pays well, even with hand labor. It would pay much better if the main burden of the cultivation were put upon the muscles of the horse. But the saving of cost in cultivation is only a small part of the benefit of the long-row arrangement. It would lead to a much more frequent and thorough cultivation of our garden crops. Most farmers neglect the garden for their field crops. The advantage of a frequent stirring of the surface soil to growing crops is greatly underestimated. It is said that it pays to hoe cabbage every morning before breakfast during the early part of the season. We can testify to the great advantage of cultivation every week. This frequent breaking of the crust admits of a freer circulation of the air among the roots below, and makes the most of the dews and rains that fall. The manufacture of plant food goes on more rapidly, and to a certain extent, cultivation is a substitute for manure. Another benefit of the long-row system would be the almost certain enlargement of the fruit and vegetable garden, and a better supply of these fruits for the table. This, we believe, would have an important sanitary influence in every household.—American Agriculturist for May.

—The prohibitory amendment was defeated on third reading Thursday in the Pennsylvania House, but the Senate passed to third reading the bill to prohibit "treating."

—Farm reports state that in California an average crop is anticipated, the increased acreage in the State offsetting the damage done by drought. Glowing prospects are received from Wisconsin, Minnesota, Nebraska, Iowa, and Dakota, where the present seeding time conditions have never been excelled.

—At Utica, Ind., Thursday, one Lewis, while drunk, murdered his infant child with a club and inflicted fatal injuries on his wife with an ax. He was imprisoned at Jeffersonville.

—The bill in the Canadian Parliament for incorporating the Orange lodges was defeated last week on second reading.

—The Parliament House at Quebec was destroyed by fire Thursday. Its destruction is doubtless due to incendiarism, and is attributed to the Fenians. It was a beautifully situated edifice of white brick, about 250 feet long, on the top of Mountain Hill.

—Mounted police are guarding the Parliament buildings at Vienna, in consequence of a threat to destroy them received by the President of the Reichstag.

—Admiral Seymour and Lord Wolseley, in recognition of their Egyptian services, have been awarded £2,000 annually each by Parliament, to descend to their heirs.

BUSINESS.

It is a pleasure to speak of the encouraging features of our reform work and especially so of the increase in the number of our readers. We have not realized a "boom," but steady growth has been the rule and only a small number have withdrawn from our list. Our patrons have set us a good example by not "grumbling and finding fault" which we have endeavored to imitate. There are a few people in the world who seem to get a bad start and to stand "edgewise" all the way through, who never turn a "fair side" to friend or fellow until they make the "last turn" at the "Gate ajar," but fortunately from such we have largely escaped. We hope "to hew to the line," avoid discourteous personalities, merit and receive the increased patronage of those who love the truth, and report YOUR paper on a sound basis with a paying list before the autumn leaves turn yellow in the early frosts. Will you help as you have opportunity?

If you want to interest the young people in your family, Sabbath School, or neighborhood more thoroughly in our reform. Put HOLDEN WITH CORDS into their hands. They will read it, and be benefited. Price, in cloth $1.00; paper, 50 cents; per dozen in cloth $9.00, paper cover, $4.00; at the office of Christian Cynosure.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

"Where is your peroration?" asked Judge Wylie in the Star-route trial the other day, lifting his head out of an old law book. "This is the fifth day." His remarks were addressed to Mr. Ker of the government counsel. That worthy is deaf and Mr. Merrick answered for him to look for it "day after to-morrow." Ker actually got through in six days and the defense were tempted to move that the case go to the jury without more argument, perhaps out of mere mercy to that wretched body of men who have now given over five months of their time to this interminable case. It looks as if the government lawyers were either drawing so much pay that they are loth to have the case stop; or, expecting defeat, they can retire with most honor to themselves if the business is protracted until one of the jury dies. One of them has a cancer it is said and they have some hope of talking him to death. At the best the law department of the government has not by any means covered itself with glory. The whole business from the time legal proceedings were begun has halted and stumbled along, as if the only purpose was to make money out of it and hurt no one of the men on trial.

The discussion of the management of the daily press has not ceased in Chicago. The echoes of Mr. Cook's voice had not died away when Dr. Henson of the First Baptist church conceived the idea of a conference between the representatives of the pulpit and the press of the city. The reason of the proposition is Dr. Henson's belief that there are many questions of social and governmental reform in which there might be agreement and a united action. He succeeded so far as to get a committee of ministers appointed to arrange for the meeting, but he finds so many points of disagreement that no practical good could come of the project and it is abandoned. This result does not speak well for the daily press, if its managers are so little in harmony with the representatives of religion. Dr. Henson has perhaps found that there is little hope of any human agency ever changing the leopard spots of immorality and infidelity which tarnish the fame of our leading papers.

The same bad spirit in the management of our secular press which set the Washington funeral story afloat, has throughout the temperance war in Kansas used the same weapons of slander and villification. It has just set agog a story that Governor St. John attempted to become mayor of Leavenworth, and was badly worsted at the polls. This might have passed muster if it were not so generally known that St. John had his residence at Topeka. As it is, however, it amounts only to a very lame attempt to injure a man who has vowed, as he tells us, "With all the power that God may give me, during the remainder of my life, to take part in the good fight that is now being made against the disgraceful dram-shop system of this country, with the hope that eventually the day will come when neither the state nor nation will sell to this great curse the right to destroy or menace the peace and happiness of even the humblest home in the land." He is now in the East, speaking in Baltimore and Washington and during the present month will give his efforts to the cause of temperance in Pennsylvania.

The authorities of New York city have again in a spasmodic way grappled with the liquor dealers to compel their obedience to the Excise law preventing their business on the Sabbath. One hundred dealers were arrested last Sabbath and an exchange says of the policemen's work the week before: "The Excise law was strictly enforced last Sabbath in New York, and the sale of liquor was almost entirely prevented. Even the bars of the hotels were closed and the array of decanters and glasses covered from view. As a consequence the day was one of unusual order and quiet, the only murder committed being in one of the few saloons which the police had failed to close. One of the men concerned in the tragedy exclaimed as he was arrested, 'Drink did it.' It was demonstrated that the liquor traffic can be arrested, in full tide, if the officers of the law are so disposed. The lesson and its argument will not be forgotten by temperance men."

The devastating storm which swept large districts in the South on the 22d ult. was one of the most destructive of life of any recorded in the history of the country. The tornado which in the same vicinity swept Natchez away years ago, perhaps equalled it in this particular. All through the week the reports came in from remote districts, almost every one bearing the black mark of mortal calamity. The storm was most severe and destructive through the central portion of Mississippi south of Jackson, the capital, but its dark wings swept portions of lower Georgia and Louisiana and away to the north in Tennessee much property was destroyed. On the evening before a tornado swept across Sac county, Iowa, destroying many buildings, but little loss of life or limb is reported. The direction of the Mississippi storm was northerly and its track about one-fourth of a mile wide, sweeping a clean path through forests, farms and villages. The loss of property, where no more fatal results were experienced, will fall heavily upon the whole region, which is largely peopled with colored people who own little more than their humble homes.

"The Republic is peace," was a favorite expression of the far-seeing Thiers, first president of France. The same idea is frequently expressed by the German press. But a more emphatic word comes from Bismarck's press-organ, which ominously says that if monarchy were restored in France, Germany would not long have to wait an attack, as the restored monarchy would probably declare war without a warning. The first road to popular favor the adventurer who hoped to overthrow the republic would find open, would be to revive the national enthusiasm in martial exploits and to revenge a national dishonor. So the German government, extremely monarchical, almost despotic, prefers that its next neighbor preserve its republican institutions. If its nursing shall succeed in preserving the present government in France, and republicanism arises in that country into a glorious reality, the effect upon the German people will be to overthrow monarchy. Bismarck is thus not warming a serpent that shall sting him exactly, but strengthening a feeble friend whose example will lead him to abandon some grievous errors of state policy.

Earthquake shocks attended with unusual phenomena have lately visited the west coast of South America extending up into Mexico. Heavy and substantial buildings have been shaken down and much pecuniary loss visited upon the inhabitants. A volcano near Lake Nicaragua has begun an eruption for the first time and an island at the mouth of the river Atrato, which empties into the Gulf of Darien, has sunk out of sight. This island was surveyed by the U. S. steamer Firebrand some years ago. These natural disturbances may have some effect in the calculations of canal builders. Earthquake shocks will not strengthen the immense locks and dams required for the Panama and Nicaraugua canals, though the Eads' ship railway might survive. Captain Eads, it is said, has not abandoned his scheme; he even expects it will be completed before the close of 1887. The Nicaraugua company are also purhing forward. At Panama work seems to be at a standstill. Two years of labor have been expended and some $26,000,000 laid out, but the real work has hardly begun. The difficulties attending the completion of these great enterprises are, no doubt, barely appreciated by the best informed engineers whose calculations may in a day be overthrown by some natural convulsion peculiar to the region.

BLANDINA.

PAGAN PERSECUTIONS, ANCIENT AND MODERN.

In the year of our Lord 177 (we quote from Milman) rumors of another invasion of Germans from the North, seemed to hang like a threatening storm over southern France. The pagan people there being terrified by these rumors were excited to fury, and especially against their Christian fellow citizens. The Christians were on a sudden exposed to a general attack of the populace. Clamors soon grew to personal violence; Christians were struck, dragged about the streets, plundered, stoned, shut up in their houses, until the more systematic hostility of the ruling authorities ordered them to be arrested and imprisoned until the arrival of the governor. One man of birth and rank, Nettius Epagathus, boldly undertook their defense against the foul charges that the pagans made against them. He was charged with being himself a Christian, and fearlessly admitted the honorable accusation. The greater part of the Christian community of Lyons and Vienne, to which city both Herod and Pontius Pilate, had, singularly enough formerly been banished, resolutely adhered to their belief; but others failed in the hour of trial, and purchased their security by a weak submission. Some pagan slaves were at length compelled, by the dread of torture, to confirm the odious charges which were generally advanced against the Christians:—that they feasted on human flesh; indulged in promiscuous and incestuous intercourse, in Thyestean feasts and Ordipodean weddings. The forced confessions of these tortured slaves exasperated the unthinking populace, which gave a free scope to its sanguinary ferocity. The more distinguished victims were Sanctus, a deacon of Vienne; a new convert named Maturus, and Attalus, from Pergamus in Asia Minor. They were at first tortured by means too horrible to describe. Many perished in the suffocating air of noisome dungeons; many had their feet strained to dislocation in the stocks, and others, the most hated victims, had plates of hot iron placed upon the most sensitive parts of their bodies.

Among the victims was the aged Bishop of Lyons, Pothinus, now in his ninetieth year, who died in prison after two days, from the ill-usage that he had received from the populace. When the frantic rabble had surrounded him with their insults, and demanded with contumelious cries—"Who is the God of the Christians?" he calmly replied, "Wert thou worthy thou shouldst know."

The ampitheater was the great public scene of popular barbarity against the Christians. They were exposed to wild beasts; made to sit in a heated iron chair, till their flesh reeked upward with an offensive odor.

An order from the Emperor, who was of course interested to preserve the pagan religion, instead of allaying the popular frenzy, gave ample license to its uncontrolled violence. Those who denied faith in Christ were to be released; those who persisted in it were condemned to death.

But the most remarkable incident in this fearful and afflicting scene was this, that the chief honors of resistance to pagan cruelty for the sake of Christ are due to a female slave. Even the Christians themselves scarcely seemed aware of the deep and universal influence of their sublime doctrines. The mistress of the slave girl Blandina, herself subjected to these pagan violences, feared lest the weak body and, still more, the debased condition of the lowly companion in her trial, might betray her to deny the Lord. Blandina shared in all the most excrutiating sufferings with the other victims. She equalled the strongest of them in the calm and unpretending superiority to every pain which malice, irritated and licensed, as it were, to exceed, if it were possible, its own barbarities on the person of a slave, could inflict. Astonished and vexed at the calm bearing of a slave under their inflictions, their malignity invented new tortures, which she still bore with the same equable magnanimity.

She was first led forth with Sanctus, Maturus, and Attalus; and, no doubt, the ignominy to them was intended to be heightened by thus associating them with a slave. The wearied executioners wondered that her life could endure during the horrid succession of torments which they inflicted upon her. Blandina's only reply was—"I am a Christian, and no wickedness is practiced among us."

In the ampitheater, she was suspended to a stake, while the combatants, Maturus and Sanctus, derived vigor and activity from the tranquil prayers which she uttered in her agony; and the less savage wild beasts kept aloof from their prey. A third time she was brought forth, as a public exhibition of suffering, with a youth of fifteen, named Ponticus. During every kind of torment, her language and her example animated the courage and confirmed the endurance of the boy, who at length expired under the torture. Blandina rejoiced at the approach of death, as if she had been invited to a wedding banquet, and not thrown to wild beasts. She was at length released. After she had been scourged, placed in the iron chair, enclosed in a net, and, now in a state of insensibility, tossed by a bull, some more merciful barbarian transpierced her with a sword. The remains of all the martyrs, after remaining long unburied, were cast into the Rhone, in order to mock and render still more improbable their hopes of a resurrection.

Such is the character of the persecutions that were inflicted upon Christians by the worshipers of pagan idols in the second century of our era. The heroism of these martyrs in refusing to deny the Saviour is sublime. Would the Christians of the present day endure so much for the truth's sake?

Reader, there is a class of men among us, called Freemasons, who teach and practice a pagan superstition as bad as that of ancient Rome; who are constantly entrapping young Americans into their toils, and forcing them to swear to suffer mutilation if they disclose certain secrets; who deny Christ in order to commend their superstition to Jews, infidels and pagans; and who intimidate men by black-balling, backbiting, marring their good name, thwarting their business operations, and destroying their political prospects. They have frowns, cold shoulders, brutal arrogance, contemptuous jawing, withholding of sympathy, and all the vocabulary of Jesuitic tricks at their command, like a street harlot with her repulsive arts. They have the power, and the disposition, to render good men's lives almost intolerable. As they teach a lying use of the Scriptures, and bestow a mystic reverence upon things unworthy of it, they are a constant source of injury to the Christian religion, and to every honest man and woman in the country. In short, relatively considered, the pagan reverence paid for squares and compasses, gavels, sheep-skin aprons, etc., is worse than that paganism of Rome, in resisting which for Christ's sake the slave girl Blandina was persecuted to death.

And now, if you ask a modern Christian to help you oppose this Masonic paganism that is destroying like a gangrene, the church and the republic, watch him and observe what he will do and say. It is not impossible that he will grow pale and tremble at the very idea of opposing a power that is able to inflict upon him so much injury. He will feel a sense of shame at being seen by Freemasons with an Anti-masonic tract or paper in his hands. He will tell you that there are a great many good men in the lodge; Deacon This and the Rev. Mr. That; and that an institution to which George Washington belonged could not be a bad one. Or perhaps he will try to make light of the powers of the lodge for evil; anything, in short, but expose his interests to danger by displeasing the medley of Jews, infidels, rum-sellers, tricksters, deacons and clergymen that makes up the Masonic lodge. Very few will show the spirit of the early martyrs and deny the lodge for the sake of Christ.

And now, if some bishop of an American church will step aboard the cars with me, I may, perhaps, show him a sight which this shepherd of souls ought to contemplate. I may be able to show him an American lady (she thinks herself a lady, and a Christian one too) who, when the conductor approaches her, will show him a sign, or a symbol, or both, which has been given to her by a Masonic father, husband, brother, lover, or friend of the lodge, by showing which she expects to receive sly attentions from the officials of the road, over and above those which are paid to other American women. And she willingly receives these unequal favors from a lodge of Masons which denies Christ, and which teaches pagan doctrines, even in the bosom of the church itself, worse than those in resisting which the poor slave girl Blandina lost her life.

What would this bishop of souls do if I were to show him such a sight? It is perhaps an even chance that, occupied with the more fashionable conventionalities of his position in life, he wholly neglects the moral interests of his flock; and, observing the signs or symbols thrown out by the lady, he finds a new bond of union with her, a Masonic one, and for the rest of the journey holds a delightful communion with the Masonic saint.

Generous-hearted young Americans! before entering the Masonic lodge, please cast one thought back to the poor slave girl, Blandina. AMERICAN.

AN UNUSUAL WITNESS.

BY REV. J. K. ALWOOD.

A Methodist pastor in Lenawee county, Michigan, says, "I have no hesitancy in saying that I perfectly detest the whole system of Freemasonry.... I have noticed that my converts are not Masons, i. e., they do not come from that quarter.... I have not seen a Mason who is a spiritual worker in the church; some are financial workers, but not spiritual.... I believe that a man cannot be an intelligent Mason and a Christian at the same time.... I think there is a going back on Masonry in our [Detroit] conference.... John Levington did more good [in his war on secretism] in this conference than he gets credit for.... Not more than about one-third of our conference members are Masons.... I do not fight it—do not talk against it publicly." He thinks soft treatment will do more good. So his church thinks—or acts—and it is so full of secretism that it cannot breathe without permission from the lodge-power. The same is true of all the churches who treat it in the same way.

If Masonry is a good, benevolent institution, without the least antagonism against the Christian religion in it, as its votaries claim, how shall we account for the solemn fact so constantly observed by all really pious men all over the land, that it robs its active adherents of their spirituality and anxiety for the salvation of souls? Whenever a pious, spiritual worker falls into the folds of this destructive institution, a withering and shrinking up in his spirituality becomes apparent forthwith. That this is not imaginary on the part of Anti-masonic sectarianism becomes obvious from the testimony of such witnesses as the one before us. And they are quite respectable in number, though altogether too few for the vigorous advancement of righteousness. The victims do not see the dire effects of the mighty destroyer. Sin always shuts out the very light which is indispensably requisite to reformation.

Another question: How long can a watchman on Zion's wall keep a pure conscience with closed lips in presence of a giant, monster evil which he sees to be "perfectly detestable" in its character and pernicious in its effects? How can the watchman save his own soul when he silently sees the enemy destroying the souls of his brethren? Will not the blood of souls be required at his hands? In that awful day when "the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies" and "the sword of the Spirit" is pitted with the record of the "watchmen," will there not be fearful havoc with the "stomach theology" which is now so popular in the American pulpit? Does not God send watchmen to fight with "the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God," against all agencies and influences which war against the work of the Holy Spirit? Will not that blessed Spirit be vindicated finally? Will he finally vindicate those who for bread deserted him in the fight? Will he own before the assembled universe those who were ashamed or afraid to stand by his truth before a few feeble men, who at the worst can only "kill the body, but cannot kill the soul?"

Another question: How can this preacher retain a pure conscience while operating as a co-laborer with men of power who stand in the advocacy and defense of a "most detestable" and most powerful institution which is ruining so many? How can he bid them God-speed, knowing that they are leading souls to ruin by their advocacy of a "perfectly detestable" institution which invariably robs men of their "spirituality"? Or how can he extend to them the hand of ministerial fellowship when he cannot bid them God-speed? Are they not "bliud leaders"? Can he wish them success in blindly leading men into blindness? Does he not, by his church relationship, bid them God-speed in their destructive work? Is he not a "partaker of other men's sins?"

By an invariable law of our being sin closes the moral eye against the very light which is indispensible to reformation. How rapidly a falling soul accelerates its own motion towards a state of perpetual moral turpitude and changeless doom. If Satan is not an imbecile he certainly has a fixed policy well proclaimed throughout the domains of Gehenna to clear the track and smooth the way when greater lights are falling. Where could a track be laid smoother than in a softly-cushioned, well-moneyed pulpit? And will not wicked men seek the most luxurious places? Though the pastor before us is probably straight, yet what can we expect of his successor, seeing we know that some of his predecessors were guilty of positive falsehood, denying by lip and pen that they were members of the craft when, as was afterward proven, by the testimony of fellow-craftsmen, they actually were members? And what will be the fate of this good brother if he change not his views of the craft? He will find that he has not chosen the smoothest track. When he discovers his inconsistency in refusing to warn his flock against the wiles of the destroying wolf, he will commence this heavenly work in harmony with his heavenly calling, and so stir up the arch enemy, and plunge into external troubles awful and deep; or else he will have a rough, short war with conscience, blind his moral eyes by excluding the light of heaven from his soul, and thus commence the smooth, descending course toward the lower lake. He will probably do the latter; for he already drinks of a soporific rill which flows from under the threshhold of the temple of Baal. (G. T.)

Is not our nation becoming imbecile? Is it not like a voluptuous, improvident booby, spending at least twice as much for carnal gratification as for health of muscle, culture of brain and right education of conscience all taken together? And is there the least ground for hope of reformation while Christians endorse secretism under the name of reform and waste their means and energies marching under the banners of false pretenders? Satan runs secretism; but he never means reform. He incites sectarian religionists and hireling preachers to gratify their partizan spirit and cupidity by means of plausible institutions under the name of reform; but the reform runs backward under the chicanery and rascality of politicians and capitalists protected by their clans. If he be not an imbecile, he certainly has a fixed policy to run all his forces under some title or banner stolen from Christianity.

A point which should never be forgotten is the fact that whenever the spirit of Christ rules in a heart, no matter what the church connection be, conscience invariably condemns the fruits of lodge labor. It detects something which is not of Christ, but the contrary. Not the least disgusting to our hero among the hideous features of Masonry, is its pagan funeral. He also notices the awful fact that dying sinners trust in the efficacy of the craft for salvation, ignoring the blood of Christ.

CONVERTED.

BY GEO. H. WILLIAMS.

"The lion shall eat straw like the ox." These are a part of the words by which the Word of God (Isaiah 11: 7) foretold the wonderful effects of the Gospel on believers. "If any man be in Christ he is a new creature." 2 Cor. 5: 17. The changed appetite shows the changed nature, from that of a flesh-loving, cruel wild beast, to that of the gentle ox. The unchanged lion will eat flesh laid on straw in the stall of an ox, but have no relish for the straw. So the unconverted man will, with hearty appetite, engage in worldly amusements and pleasures in the church, but will have no relish for true religious duties and privileges which the converted man—the real Christian—delights in. The gay sociables and parties, the oyster suppers in aid of church funds or those of benevolent societies, and the fairs in worldly style for like purposes are all agreeable to him, as are also the social secret entertainments, and all the anti-Christian doings of the lodges of Freemasons, Odd-fellows, Knights of Pythias, and others not open to all church members, but allowed by most churches.

For aught that appears from any action of most churches, he may consider that they believe that with these carnal appetites he may go to heaven at last.

How long shall these things be?

BROTHER REFORMERS.

We are workers in one vineyard;
Some are strong and some are weak:
But the smiling of the vintage
Is the common joy we seek.
Some must train the vine and prune it,
Some must stoop to dress the mould,
But the few can pluck the clusters,
In the autumn's haze and gold.

We are builders, and the temple
Rises slowly day by day;
Some must lay the polished corners
Some the brick of heavy clay,
Only one can place the cap-stone
On the summit grand and high,
While the shout of "Grace unto it,"
Rises to the vaulted sky.

We are fighting in the battle,
But we cannot all command;
Most of us must march at orders,
Forward like a soldier band.
Fame is not the hero's blessing,
But the sense of duty done,
Life and treasure all are ventured
Ere the victory is won.

Golden prizes lie before us,
And the race is open now;
Not the swift alone are victors,
Wearing crowns upon their brow,
For the lame and halt ones running
God hath promised each a goal;
O my poor and sorrowing brother,
Thou shalt be a victor soul!

Let the blessed kingdom hasten,
When the will of God shall be,
Evermore the law and pleasure
Of his people glad and free;
Would we strive to be the greatest,
Let us then be servants all;
God has crowns and jewels waiting,
For the lowly and the small.

THE DANGER OF THE SOUTH.

The multiplication of secret societies among the Southern negroes is an evil that cannot very well be corrected by heroic treatment; but it is one much to be deprecated. It is, we suppose, one of the inevitable stages toward manhood—the stage of childishness. Prof. H. T. Kealing, of Paul Quin College, Texas, gives, in The Christian Recorder, a ludicrous account of the trouble these societies make for a minister. Here is a specimen:

"The minister in charge appoints board meeting on Monday night. 'Oh! Elder, I can't come then; it's the night of "degree mecting."' He appoints Tuesday night for choir practice. 'O, I must meet the Sisters of Ruth,' says one; 'And the Queen Esther's Court meets, too,' says another. 'The Sisters of the Mysterious Ten will fine me if I am absent,' whines Miss Julia, the leading soprano; 'And the Seven Stars of Consolation will never excuse me,' simpers Miss Kate, the superlative alto. 'I never fail to meet my Immaculate Lodge,' rumbles the bass; 'And you know I'm secretary of the Knights of Wise Men,' warbles the tenor. 'Class meeting Wednesday night,' annouuces the preacher. No one says anything aloud: no one has the moral, or immoral courage; but Wednesday night finds the preacher straining himself to sing 'I love Jesus, yes I do; I do love Jesus'; and well he may say, 'I love Jesus,' for he is about the only one in the house to love him. Where are the others, do you ask? Well, Brother Prolix Pomposity has gone to be initiated into the Order of the Kinky-Headed Katahdins, and all the others, except those who 'don't feel well enough,' have gone to meet the Grand Master of the Guiding Stars of the Union. Thursday night the U. B. F.'s 'set up' a new lodge, and everybody is initiated into that, because you can get in for half of what it will cost after organization.

"In despair, the minister asks: 'Can't you come out to-morrow (Friday) night to prayer meeting?' 'Brother Tom I-never-'specs-to-turn-back' says, 'Now, Elder, you know I told you that the Subterranean Sons of Smyrna give a festival Friday and Saturday nights, and we can't come, on that account; but we'll be here Sunday night, suah.'"

It is very good of these frogs of Egypt that they don't hop Sunday night.—The Independent.

If we are not mistaken, there is no recorded case of a public confession of guilt by an Irish agrarian or political murderer when on the scaffold. He usually devotes his dying speech either to denouncing the witnesses or to denying all knowledge of the crime, which seems to show that there must be some secret method of satisfying his conscience as to this mode of saving his memory. There is some light thrown on the whole state of popular feeling by the admission of Carey, the informer, that while planning his murders he was a member of a Catholic "Sodality," or religious society, whose members were bound to take the sacraments at certain stated intervals. He was probably not as great a hypocrite as this would indicate. There is doubtless some condition of the conscience, of which we know nothing, which enables these men to be "good Catholics," in their own eyes, while engaged in a certain class of crime, and to deny it to the last gasp without imperilling their salvation.—Nation.

THE SERMON.

OBERLIN'S JUBILEE YEAR.

A SERMON PREACHED BY REV. JAMES BRAND IN THE FIRST CHURCH, OBERLIN, O., SABBATH MORNING, APRIL 15, 1883.

TEXT.—"A jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you."—Lev. 25: 11.

I. THE ORIGINAL JUBILEE.

A jubilee, to the Hebrews, was literally a time of shouting or blowing of trumpets. But although the main features of the institution have quite a secular aspect, it nevertheless had a deep spiritual purpose. It was really a religious festival. It was inaugurated on the "Day of Atonement." It was holy,—"Ye shall hallow the fiftieth year." It was to be a reminder of the goodness of God and of their dependence upon him, and a symbol of spiritual emancipatiou. It was a time of deep, religious joy, when all the bad elements of society were to be checked and the better side of human nature was to have the ascendency.

The law requiring the restoration of land to the original owners, when it had fallen into other hands through misfortune, was a recognition of the fact that all things, even the very soil on which they walked, belonged to God and were at his disposal. The general unsettling of estates, the breaking-up of possessions, reminded them that they were only strangers and sojourners on the earth. The bondman was to claim his liberty because he could belong, really, to none but God. It was fitted, moreover, to correct the evils which naturally grew up in human society, both social and political. It meant both mercy and justice to the poor. It prevented the monopoly of wealth in the hands of a Jew. Though a theocracy, this was a democratic measure. It was a guard against organized selfishness. It was specially intended to turn the thoughts of the whole people, periodically, back to the first prineiples of their relation to their Maker, in order that they might correct their mistakes and might begin anew with a new sense of God's claims and of the fact that they were his chosen people. The year of jubilee, therefore, was a very great time. Divine wisdom was behind the whole arrangement.

II. THE OBERLIN JUBILEE.

We, too, have reached our jubilee year. This fiftieth year should be hallowed. It will do no harm to have a little shouting, or blowing of trumpets. But it ought to be, and doubtless will be, something grander than mere gratulation. It ought to have a noble, spiritual purpose behind it—a purpose looking to the future of the kingdom of God. To this end, it seems to me, the grandest possible feature of this jubilee year would be to go back to first prineiples—to reaffirm our devotion to the purpose, the principles, the doctrines, the spirit of the founders; to formally rededicate the places, the churches, the institution to the service of God, in the spirit of the fathers. Aftcr fifty years of heroic struggle and substantial, God-given mercies, such a gospel re-consecration of everything here to Christ would be fitting, congruous, sublime. It is due to God; it is due to the fathers, it is due to the future. It would not, of course, involve the attempt to reproduce the past in formal or minute detail. It would not involve any foolish adulation of men who, like others, had their weaknesses and their foibles. We are not to go back, but forward. We cannot live on the heroisms of the past. We do not want physical struggles with the forests. We would not return to the log house, nor to all the old habits of social life; not because they were not good, but because God has set us down beyond them. The uoble legacy which the founders here are leaving to this generation does not consist in a yoke to bind us to the past, but in a great inspiration to a right use of the future. Circumstances, forms, methods, men, must of course pass away with the progress of years. But the aims and principles remain. To be true to the fathers we must advance, not recede; we must enlarge our views; we must adapt ourselves to the demands of our time as they did to theirs. We must welcome every new adjustment of the gospel to the changing wants of men, and at the same time conserve and sacredly transmit the spirit, the purposes, the faith, the prayer, the simplicity, the economy, the heroic, self-denying love of the founders, which is their real legacy to the futurc. It is in the light of these considerations that I would suggest and urge, as the crowning act of our jubilee year, the reaffirmation of the principles of the founders, and the hearty and solemn rededication of the place to God.

III. PRINCIPLES WHICH OUGHT TO BE PERPETUATED.

Let us look at some of the characteristics of this place and its founders which deserve to be ratified and perpetuated.

(1.) The founders were men and women who regarded the soil they tilled, the houses they built, the property they acquired, the families they raised, together with their own bodies and souls, as belonging to and to be administered for God. This Biblical and sublime recognition of the will and the rights of the Supreme Being, if I mistake not, was the moral rock-bed on which Oberlin was built; their very existence here, to use their own language, was to be for the "express purpose of glorifying God in doing good to men." Hence they solemnly vowed to train their children "in body, intellect and heart, for the service of the Lord." For the same reason they agreed to make the interests of the Oberlin Institute identical with their own and to do what they could to extend its influence. For the same reason they vowed to administer their estates for God. They pledged themselves to make "special effort to sustain the institutions of the gospel at home and abroad." They covenanted to "maintain deep-toned and elevated personal piety, to provoke each other to love and good works, to live together in all things as brethren, and to glorify God in their bodies and spirits which were his." This recognition of God as the sole proprietor of themselves, the place and all that pertained to it, forever, is very familiar here, but it is of unspeakable importance as an element in the history of the place.

(2.) A second early characteristic of the place, and onc whieh has made the college largely what it is, was the warm, vigorous, rational Christian life in which the institution has been embosomed from the first. Though a great educational center, the distinctive feature of the place has manifestly been religious. Oberlin had its birth in a great religious movement; its history has been pre-eminently a religious history. Its mission is a religious mission. It cannot be true to its calling if it ever becomes anything else.

(3.) A third characteristic of the founders was that they taught positively not negatively. They believed something and so had something to say. They aeeepted Christ totally; and Christ was not simply a truth seeker. It does not appear that he ever doubted or questioned. Pilate asked, "What is truth?" Jesus never did. He came not to seek truth, but to announce it. For this eause he eame into the world, to "bear witness unto the truth." This place, following Christ's lead, has urged upon the world positive truths, as distinguished from the negative or speeulivei nquiry. And if we would meet the wants of humanity this feature of Oberlin must be perpetuated. This has been one secret of her power. And this gave rise to another characteristic of the founders, viz.:

(4.) A sublime, practical hopefulness for the future. "Lamenting the degeneracy of the church and the deplor able condition of the perishing world," and viewing with prophetic vision and with peculiar interest the influence which the Valley of the Mississippi was to exert on the nation, they plunged into the depths of the forest, not with the cowardly despair of the pessimist or the anchorite, but with sublime purpose to save the world. They began with a hopefulness in the Gospel, when fairly applied, like that of the apostles, when they attacked and conquered the Roman Empire. They knew they had great truths to tell which the nations needed, and that even a little band of men who "mean what they say and say God's truth" will always have a hearing and will always be a power.

(5.) The general system of distinctively Christian education which Oberlin has tried to impress upon the Mississippi Valley is another characteristic which ought to be maintained. This marrying of education and religion, this "unity of the faith and knowledge," is the apostle's own pathway to the perfect man. It is the saving principle for both the nation and the individual in modern times. The leading idea in it has seemed to me to be this, that learning should be sound, profound, liberal, but subordinate to religion. Science, philosophy, literature, politics, oratory, music, are all to be tributary, not ultimately to culture, but to the kingdom of God. They are not ends in themselves. They never have been regarded as such here. They are each and all the "handmaids of religion." This lifts the whole aim and spirit of the place up to a distinctively Christian level, where if it fails to be a good spiritual power it violates its charter and sinks to a lower plane. It is also true that in the educational system here, mental and moral science has had a much larger place, relatively to physical science, than in most other institutions of the land. Physics have not crowded out metaphysics. The study and analysis of the moral nature of man, from the pulpit if not in the curriculum, has been in the very atmosphere of the churches and the college. This I believe to have been of incalculable importance to the cause of Christ; for it has preserved an awakened conscience, which is fundamental to religion. Not, of course, that natural science is essentially either immoral or atheistic in its tendencies. But, on the one hand the study of matter has no such elevating, subduing, solemnizing influence on the soul as the study of the great facts of our mental and moral nature and destiny; and, on the other, when the physical sciences come to overshadow everything else, as they do in many institutions to-day, religion is shorn of its power and compelled to retire to a secondary place. The evil influence of this modern tendency of physical science to take possession of educational centres was pointed out long ago by Sir William Hamilton. He said: "It diverts attention from the phenomena of moral liberty, which are revealed to us in the recesses of the human mind alone, and, by exhibiting merely the phenomena of matter and extension, it habituates us only to the contemplation of the laws of a blind, mechanical necessity. And the result is that the student becomes a materialist if he speculates at all." The evil referred to here, however, is not an evil inherent in physical science, but in a too exclusive, disproportionate attention to physical study. Materialistic skepticism advances, not in proportion as material facts are verified but in proportion as the problems of matter are given a monopoly of men' thoughts.

The truth is that whenever Christianity is to be a power in the great educational centers of the land, theology and morals, the study of God and his moral law and the moral nature of man, must have a supreme place. This has characterized this town from the beginning. The divine science of Theology has been king; it has been a free, progressive theology, but it has been king. The difference between Oberlin as a center of spiritual power and some other institutions which might be named, is simply the difference in the place given to God in the thought of the people and in the system of education.

I will mention but one other characteristic of the place, viz.: the attitude of the church and institution to all moral and political reforms. The political position of the place is well expressed in such words as these, uttered a few years ago by a leading professor: "Patriotism a part of religion;" "Loyalty to God and loyalty to government when it is loyal to God." "We mean to teach our children to respect law and its ministers, but we also mean to teach them that they will not be dutiful to the State if they do not hold her to duty to God, and that they will be traitors if they obey a law which breaks the law of Heaven." How did this sublime radicalism come about? How came this position toward slavery and the infamous wrongs of the liquor traffic and other lesser evils to be taken? It was not by any formal compact or any organic hostility. No, it came about naturally from the place given to God. They adopted the Gospel in its simplicity. And it is everlastingly true that no people can accept it as a whole, and live it, without taking this position against these gigantic wrongs.

IV. SOME REASONS FOR THE REDEDICATION OF THE PLACE TO GOD.

Now, while sloughing off that which is merely temporary, while aiming to be progressive, while looking still to the future and not to the past, it is safe to say that these principles and this spirit, which have made the history of Oberlin what it is, should be re-affirmed and ratified even in this jubilee year. Let me mention very briefly some of the reasons for such a rededication of the place to the service of God and such a re-affirmation of our loyalty to the principles of the founders, as I have suggested.

1. Without such an act there can be no jubilee worthy of the fathers and the history of the place. It is a great thing to be worthy of such a history—to inherit the principles, to enter into the labors, to partake of the heroic struggles, to imitate the self-denial of the dauntless, patient, self-forgetting men and women of God who have made this place what it is, is a supreme privilege. It is said that "God sifted three kingdoms that he might send choice spirits to people this continent." We might add: God sifted this continent to find the right spirits, such as Shipherd, Finney, Morgan, Dascomb, Father Keep and their colleagues, to build Oberlin in these Western wilds. It would be difficult, therefore, to conceive of a more accursed apostacy than that of proving unworthy of such a history or false to the sacred trust bequeathed to us from the past.

2. A second reason for this endorsement of the past is the fact that the demand for those principles or views of life held by the fathers here is still as imperative as ever. If fifty years of experience in this nation has proved anything, it is that these principles are still wanted. The fathers proposed to evangelize the world. That is God's purpose still. That prophetic view which fifty years ago was held here as to the importance of the Mississippi Valley to "the nation and the nations of the earth," is being realized; but the mighty call for these principles has only begun. The great missionary causes at home and abroad, which were only of the size of a man's hand when Oberlin was founded, are now beginning to fill the moral heavens. Oberlin's future, if she is true to her purpose and history, must be on a grander scale than her past. Moreover, the demand for moral reform in almost all departments of life is not less but greater than fifty years ago. The malignant woes of intemperance, the organized villianies of the liquor traffic, trifled with by political parties while antagonizing all reason and righteousness, must still be confronted and annihilated by the gospel of Jesus. The evils of secretism, creeping into and sapping the foundations of society, must still be resisted; the tendency to self-indulgence, the passion for display, the the corrupting influence of luxury coming into the church of God, must still be met by the higher laws of simplicity of manners, economy of living and fidelity to the Cross.

3. The plain, simple, sublime old doctrines of the gospel taught here from the beginning are not changed—cannot change, or lose their power. New adaptations of truth have been made and must still be made; new creed statements have been and will still be demanded. New light must still be expected. But yet, in the fifty years that are gone no new light has arisen, or is likely to arise that can essentially change the fundamental doctrinal position of this church and college. The old gospel, just as it was when the founders cut the first tree, is still the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation. The church, the institution, that plants itself on that gospel, or walks in the light of Christ, will always be abreast of all wholesome Christian progress.

4. Our jubilee year ought to bring a new endorsement of truths taught here, because, just now, the cause of Christ seems especially to need a public, positive proclamation of undiminished faith in the great cardinal doctrines of the Word of God. And I believe that in Oberlin, if anywhere on the continent, that declaration can be honestly made.

In view, then, of our personal relations to God, in view of the ever-enlarging possibilities of usefulness, in view of our high responsibilities as a community, in view of the spiritual necessities of the nation and the world, let the year be hallowed unto us. Let it be made the means of a great spiritual uplift to town and college. In these days of doubt and unrest let us take a new and firmer grip upon the eternal things that cannot be shaken. We are stewards of the grace of God, in no ordinary degree. God expects great things here from every family, every college class, every Christian man. Our duty cannot be done to the past and the future by each one simply taking care of himself and his family. It cannot be done by the material improvement of our homes, desirable as that is; nor yet by any formal endorsement of the past. It can only be done by each church member taking up cheerfully the hard, self-denying, ordinary work for Christ which lies nearest his hand, each day, in the spirit of the Master. The distinguishing feature of the fathers here, when reduced to a single term, was unselfishness. They left the comforts of settled society and came into the woods, not to avoid the demands of the world, not to guard their own soft-handed piety in the solitudes of the recluse, but to wrestle with the forces of nature and to build up a great, vigorous, aggressive, spiritual power for God. They were willing to do hard, disagreeable work; willing to be poor all their days, and willing to be scorned by the world, if they could make the world richer in spiritual life.

Now, they are gone! But their principles remain. Are the men of to-day ready to fill their places? Or is business become the chief end of life? Is our improved material condition weaning us from loyalty to Christ? Is religion a less imperative thing to us than to the fathers? Are we here simply to make a living? If so, either the history and spiritual power of the place must perish, and Oberlin become the home of greed and selfishness, or else there must be a change, and our life and hope and time and all we have must be consecrated anew.

THE MORNING SUN DEBATE.

ELDER D. P. RATHBUN AND REV. F. W. EVANS DISCUSS THE MERITS AND DEMERITS OF FREEMASONRY.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I should have mentioned in my first letter that by agreement of the debaters each session was opened with prayer by some minister present. The beneficent effects of this service were manifest during all the discussion on debaters and auditors as well. So far as I observed not an unkind or angry word was spoken in or about the hall during the entire discussion. Another fact may also be mentioned which contributed no doubt to the same end, to-wit, the large attendance of ladies. At the afternoon sessions they composed a majority of the audiences; at night they were nearly equal to the number of the men. In this, as in the former letter, I only propose to set forth the leading points presented by each, without following closely the order observed in the debate.

Thursday afternoon Mr. Rathbun took up Masonic symbolism, and pressed the inquiry to what do these symbols point for their efficacy? What is Masonic regeneration? He wished his opponent to explain. Again Mr. Evans says: "Masonry is a religion in which all men agree." There is not a distinctive principle of Christianity in which all men agree. "The religion of Masonry is pure theism," but theism is opposed to Christianity. The woman who throws her child to the crocodiles believes in a god; so the Indian who anticipates the time when he shall pass to the happy hunting grounds; yet their faith is not consistent with Christianity. The Christian's God is not merely the G. A. O. T. U., but he is the Saviour of men. He is not merely God in one person, which is all the Mason is required to accept, but he is God in three persons, Father, Son and Holy Spirit. So soon as you get a religion in which all men agree, you destroy the triune God, and that is anti-Christian. Masonry tramples the Lord Jesus under foot. It expunges his name from Scriptures used in the lodge. He referred to 1 Pet. 2: 5–7; 2 Thes. 3: 6 and 12, and showed how Masons leave out the name of our Saviour. He affirmed that this conflicts with Rev. 22: 19.

Mr. Evans, in reply, first answered the question, What is Masonic regeneration? He said Masons do not teach regeneration as a theological dogma, but as a philosophical doctrine. It signifies passing from death to life, from mortality to immortality. It symbolizes the fact that if a man die he shall live again. He said the trouble with some is they confine regeneration to one sense—the theological. He illustrated the Masonic idea by the remark of the lady who said, "I am regenerating my dress." Another said, "I am regenerating my home." Masonry does not deny Christian regeneration. Again, Masons have a right to speak of God as the G. A. O. T. U. This designation is in harmony with the original idea of the order. The name is but a symbolic representation of the work of God. Is also in harmony with the Scriptures which teach that the Maker of all things is God. He justified the leaving out of the name of Christ from the Scriptures used in the lodge; said when he uses Scripture to prove a doctrine, he is not bound to quote every word in the verse, only so much as is required for his purpose; so Masons do. At another time he said the name of Christ is not found in the Lord's Prayer, nor in all the parables, nor in the book of Esther. He took up 2 Thes. 3: 6, and said that to use the name of the Lord Jesus Christ in the passage in the connection in which Masons used it, would be to claim that Christ had instituted Masonry. He did not so claim, yet would not admit that leaving out his name from the text proved Masonry anti-Christian. He affirmed that the principles of Masonry are in harmony with the word of God. 1. A Mason cannot be an atheist; he must believe in the Creator. Christianity teaches the same, and there is no disagreement. 2. Masonry accepts the Bible as the authentic revelation of the divine will. In the first degree it teaches that the Bible is the word of God. The Bible in the lodge is dedicated to God. 3. Masonry teaches the immortality of the soul and its accountability to God. 4. Holds to the resurrection of the body. 5. This resurrection is through Jesus Christ, called in Masonry "the Lion of the tribe of Judah." He asked where does the antagonism to Christianity come in? There is not a solitary instance in which it has, or can be shown that it antagonizes Christianity.

Mr. Rathbun, in his next speech, said: The Doctor would like to bring Christ into Masonry as the one alluded to in the Masonic symbol, the Lion of the tribe of Judah. The symbol does not allude to Christ at all, only to a figure in the standard of Judah. See Maekey's Lexicon under Judah, "The tribe of Judah bore a lion in their standard, and hence the Masonic allusion to the Lion of the tribe of Judah." There is no Christ there. He denied that Masonry teaches the doctrine of the resurrection through Jesus Christ. He affirmed that they teach this doctrine only by the false legend of Hiram Abif. He then set forth in a graphic manner the whole tragedy as it is gone through in the lodge, giving an accounut of the conspiracy of the fifteen Fellow Crafts; how twelve repented and refused to carry out the conspiracy; how three, Jubela, Jubelo, Jubelum, murdered their Grand Master and buried him; how search was instituted, the body found and raised on the five points of fellowship and Ma-ha-bone whispered in his ear. This is the way Masons teach the doctrine of the resurrection. How different from the way it is taught in the church of Christ.

Again, is it Christian to take an oath to abide by all the rules and regulations of an institution which rejects Christ? Can a Mason be a Christian and keep his Masonic obligations? Here Mr. Rathbun took up the oaths of the first three degrees, and quoting the penalties in each degree, pressed the inquiry each time, "Can a man take such an oath and say, 'Lord Jesus, I have done this for thy glory?' Would a Christian congregation allow such words in the pulpit?" He could not reconcile these penalties with Christianity. He confirmed the penalties by a quotation from Mackey's Lexicon under Penalty, in which the following words occur, "his throat was cut across with one single blow;" "the next ceremony was to tear the breast open and pluck out the heart." Mackey says, "The allusion will not escape the attentive Mason." Again, in Pierson's Traditions of Freemasonry, he says, "A solemn method of taking an oath was by placing a drawn sword across the throat." Such oaths are sinful. The duty of all who take them is to repent. The oath is hid from him beforehand, but when he finds it is wrong the Christian will confess his sin and repent.

Mr. Evans admitted that some things Mr. Rathbun had said are true and some are not true. He would not say what were true nor what not true. He re-affirmed that everything in Masonry is symbolical. Symbolic instruction is common. He instanced the fables of Æsop and the parables of Jesus. Said Masonry is a symbolical institution throughout. With reference to the objection that the candidate is pledged to secrecy before taking the oath, he answered: The candidate has every reasou to believe what is told him, that there is nothing in the obligation which can conflict with the duties he owes to God, his country, his family, his neighbor or himself. The candidate can stop when he comes to anything he thinks wrong; if he does not he is a coward, would not make a good martyr. If he goes on and then breaks his oath he is a scoundrel. When he swore the oath he intended to keep it or he did not. If he intended to keep it and did not, he is a villian. If he did not intend he is a grand rascal. He affirmed that the man who has taken the oath and broken it is not worthy to be believed. If he had a good reputation before and was a hypocrite, may he not have a good reputation and be a hypocrite afterwards? When Mr. Evans first referred to the penalties he was understood to admit the terms of the oaths, but he said the language was symbolic. He afterwards denied that there is any such penalty attached to the violation of Masonic oaths as death. The highest penalty according to Mackey is expulsion. He proceeded to justify the penalties "if," as he would say, "there are any such penalties." This he did by referring to the imprecations found in Job 31st chapter; Ps. 137: 5, 6; Ps. 109; and asked "If these are just, what harm is there in us if we say we will suffer if we break our oath?" He also spoke of the case of Wm. Morgan; said there are about twenty-five death-bed confessions as to the taking off of Morgan, yet no one claimed there were more than six engaged in it, and all agreed he was drowned, instead of having his bowels torn out, as it is claimed Masons are sworn to do with those who break their oaths.

Mr. Rathbun again took up the oaths, making some new points. Before doing so he drew a word-picture of a minister's initiation into a Masonic lodge, neither naked nor clad, neither barefoot nor shod, hoodwinked, cable-towed, received on the points of the compass, performing the rite of circum-ambulation, etc., all to extend his influence, and said if this gives influence why not enter the pulpits in the same plight. He next pictured him on his knees taking the oath. One part of that oath is that he "will not have illicit, carnal intercourse with a Master Mason's wife, mother, sister or daughter, etc." He said if a minister should come to my house and I would refuse to introduce him to my family until he had taken an oath not to violate the chastity of any member in it, would he not feel insulted? Again, if such an oath is necessary at all, why not swear Masons not to violate the chastity of any one?

In the same speech Mr. Rathbun gave his views of the symbols of Masonry. He said they were all borrowed from ancient sun worship. He quoted Mackey: "Freemasonry is a philosophical development of sun worship." He affirmed that the working of the lodge proves this. He showed by the ritual that the Worshipful Master represents the sun at his rising, the Junior Warden the sun at noon, the Senior Warden the sun at his setting. Those being initiated face the East as sun-worshippers did. In the rite of circum-ambulation they follow the course of the sun. He also affirmed that Masonry may be traced to the Egyptian mysteries; that Hiram Abif takes the place of Osiris in those mysteries, and that Osiris represents the sun.

Mr. Evans said but little on these points. He said it is not the manner of initiation which gives a minister his influence, but being a Mason. He denied that because the candidate in initiation faces the East, that fact proves Masonry sun-worship any more than because Daniel in praying faced Jerusalem, that fact proves that he worshiped Jerusalem. He tried to make a distinction between sun-worship and the worship of the sun. Said sun-worship is not material idolatry; the sun is used in Masonry purely as a symbol, an emblem of light; is used to express the idea of the resurrection of the dead; is used especially as an emblem of authority. Claiming that his opponent had given him nothiug to answer he took up the objection to Masonry that it makes false claims as to its age. He admitted that speculative Masonry can only be traced to 1717. True, certain Masonic writers trace it back to the Temple of Solomon, and some to the creation. Said most words had two meanings, a literal and a metaphorical one. The sense in which a word is used is to be determined by the connection. The word Masonry is used in a variety of senses. 1. It is sometimes used to signify Geometry. In this sense it may be traced to the creation. 2. Is sometimes used to signify the science of morality. In this sense is very old. 3. Is used to signify the principle of secrecy, and so may be traced back to early periods. 4. Is used as a synonym of symbolism, because symbolism is a prominent feature of Masonry. Symbolism is very old. 5. Is used to siguify the science of architecture. He gave us a lengthy history of this scieuce as understood and practiced iu Rome and Greece aud Egypt and Tyre, claimed that Hiram Abif, widow's son, belonged to the fraternity of Dionysian architects who had their secret mysteries, ties and signs, so as to recognize each other, that these were the only known architects in the days of Solomou who were allowed to erect public buildings; Solomon sent for them to snperintend the bnilding of the temple; they communicated the knowledge of architecture to some of the Jews who labored in the erection of the temple. His last point was, Masonry is used as a symbolic expression of a religious idea, particularly of the idea of the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the dead. He affirmed that this idea is incorporated in the legends of the 17th century, they received it from the builders of the middle ages, these from those before them. The same idea appears in the legend of the Egyptian mysteries; is found in all the ancient mysteries. This legend and this only, conuects Freemasonry with the ancient mysteries.

Mr. Rathbun disposed of all this by a little story the substance of which is, a man claimed to have a very old musket his grandfather had carried it through the revolutionary war. One who heard his claims said "the barrel is not old," and pointed to a date on it, which was quite recent. The man admitted that he had got a new barrel. The other said "the stock is new too." "Yes, I had it restocked two years ago." "That is not au old lock such as they used in revolutionary times." "No," said the owner, "I got a new lock when I had the gun restocked, but here is a piece of the old ramrod." Masonry has no more to justify its claim to antiquity than the man had of his gun. Mr. Rathbun then turned his atteutiou to the oaths of Masonry, particularly to those parts in which the Mason swears he will not be present at the iuitiating of a woman, an old man or a young man; and when he swears to keep the secrets of a Master Mason, murder and treason excepted, and these at his own option.

In this speech he met the statement made by Mr. Evans, that it was not claimed that Masonry is a divine institution, by quoting a verse of a Masonic ode, beginning, "Hail Masonry divine," and ending, "Thou art divine."

Mr. Evans did not attempt to deny the statements made by Mr. Rathbun as to Masonic oaths, but said, "Suppose Masons do swear such oaths, I challeuge any man to show them contrary to Christianity." They do not subvert justice. The construction put upon them is forced. By the same line of argument, he could prove the Bible abominable. Quoted Isa. 45:7; Ezek. 14:9, and 20:25 as passages which may easily be miscoustrued. Said every man and organization had a right to put his own constructiou on the oath he took. Freemasons are bound to help each other only so far as cousistent with religion, morality and the law of the land. If a man comes to me with a secret, I have a right to determine whether it is a Masonic secret or not. If he says he has committed crime, I am not bound to keep that, for Masonry forbids crime. Mr. Rathbun had said crimes are to be kept secret, else why except two crimes, "murder and treason." Mr. Evans said, my brother may have taken life in self-defence aud I have a right to shield him. He may be guilty of treason only as George Washington was guilty of treason against Great Britain, and I justify him.

Mr. Rathbun in openiug the discussiou Friday, brought further proofs of the identity of Masonry with ancient sun-worship as practiced in the Egyptian mysteries; said it was impossible to trace the legend of Hiram Abif to the building of the temple, the liuks are missing, there is nothing in the Bible to confirm the legend, it can be traced to the Egyptian mysteries and to Osiris the sun-god. Osiris was murdered, Hiram Abif is said to be murdered. Isis went iu search of Osiris, Masons search for Hiram Abif. Isis asked every one she met if they could give her a trace of her husband. Masons inquire of every one for Hiram. When Isis fouud Osiris there was something wanting; so when Masons find Hiram there is something wanting. Isis accideutally found her husband; Masons accidently found Hiram. In the Egyptian mysteries the candidate was kept for a season in darkness; in Masonry he is hoodwinked. They put a sash around his body, Masons put on a cable-tow. These statemeuts were supported by quotations from Oliver, Sickles, Pierson, Mackey and other Masonic authors; about twelve different passages were read, bearing on these points.

Mr. Evans evidently felt the weight of this speech supported as it was by standard Masonic authors, and tried hard to weaken the impression it made. He said the argument is based on the resemblance between Masonry and the ancieut mysteries. He affirmed that these mysteries were originally pure and uot idolatrous iu their inception; that they taught pure theism, mono-theism in opposition to those who deified men and worshiped them; that they taught pure doctrine; they simply used the sun as a symbol of life, of immortality; a representation of the regenerator, the renewer of life; a representation of the great moral sun of the universe, as in Scripture it is said, "God the Lord is a Snn." He is called the "Suu of Righteousness." Where Mackey identifies Masonry and snn-worship he only means that the sun is a symbol of the immortality of the soul, and a development of the doctrine put forth in the ancient mysteries as to the resurrection. He referred to Paul's sermon on Mars' hill, and paraphrased the expression, "Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you," in this way, "I preach the development of the doctrine you already hold." Was Paul's preaching anti-Christian, then was the development of the doctrine of Osiris anti-Christiau. Paul quoted from a heathen poet. What! endorse the doctrine of a heathen! Yes! You say that was anti-Christian. Paul says No; the doctrine is true. All truth is truth, whether spoken in heaven or in hell. Masonry is a development of the truth in heathenism. There is a resemblance between Masonry and Osiris, so there is a resemblance between the doctrines of the Bible and the doctriues of heathenism. In the Bible we have the symbol of the serpent, the heathen used that symbol before Moses was born. The idea of the incarnation was taught in the ancieut mysteries, and is found in the ancient books of the heathen. The idea of the trinity appears in heathen mythology—Jupiter, Neptune and Pluto constitute the heathen trinity. The idea of the God-man was held in the case of Hercules, who was said to have a divine father and a human mother. The cross was a sacred emblem before Christ came into the world. Do these things prove that the Bible was borrowed from heathenism? These ideas are like the ideas of the heathen. If the argument does not hold good in one case neither does it in the other.

Mr. Rathbun in following Mr. Evans read Ezekiel 8th chapter, aud explaiued it as referring to ancient sun-worship, and said it was condemned by Jehovah, and asked, Are men justified in practising in a Masonic lodge that which God has coudemued? Is it Christian to mix heathenism and Christiauity? He always supposed that sun-worship conflicted with Christianity. Is there one here who would have us go back to Osiris and snu-worship to teach the Christiau religion? Would you like the symbols of the lodge taken from heathenism brought into your churches? God never endorsed sun-worship, never said I am pleased with it. Masouic authors say, if we would understaud Masonry, we must go back to sun-worship. Is that true of the Christian religion? Shall a Christian swear to couform to all the rnles and regulatious of an institution derived from Baal or sun-worship? The doctor says, the allusions to the sun arc to teach the immortality of the soul and the resurrection of the dead. Christians have a better way. Masonry rejects the Son of God, puts him to an open shame. It goes back to Osiris and makes no meution of the blessed name of Jesus. Is it as well to trust in Osiris for the resurrectiou of the body as to trust in the Son of God?

Mr. Evans read the 8th chapter of Ezekiel again, aud said the language is not to be taken literally. It is not history, only a vision; relates to the house of Israel and not to Egyptians. No Jew engaged in the Egyptian mysteries. These men worshiped the sun. In the mysteries of Osiris they did not worship the sun, only used the sun as a symbol. There is no connectiou betweeu these things and a Masonic lodge. Ezekiel saw women weeping for Tammuz. There are no women in Masonic lodges. Masonry is not sun-worship, but "a philosophical development of sun-worship." The mysteries of Osiris were gotten up after the Arabians had taken possession of Egypt, iu order to preserve the Egyptians from Arabiau corruptions. Orignally they held pure doctrines. True, the mysteries became corrupt, but let Mr. Rathbun show that Masonry is developed from the corrupted system. The sun is prominent iu Masonry purely as a symbol. Mackey uses the sun as a symbol, just as Paul does iu 1 Cor. 15:41: "There is one glory of the sun," etc. Masonry is a development of the truth handed down from Noah, and kept pure pure in the mysteries of Osiris. It is a development of grand doctrines.

Mr. Rathbun, in opening the discussiou Friday evening, spoke of the manner in which Mr. Evaus had debated the question; how he had set up his own opinion against all the standard authorities on Masonry; how he explained the language of one as figurative, of another as symbolical, said another did not mean what he said, or if he did it was not so. He gave quite a list of instances iu which Mr. Evans had pursued this course. He said, If I could see that God has honored and blessed Masonry I would not oppose it as I have. He had never heard of a man brought under conviction in a Masonic lodge. He had never heard of a revival of religion in a lodge. Instead of being for the benefit of mankind, Masonry has been used for the worst of purposes. Not only is it opposed to the interests of religion, but also to republican institutions. Here came in quotations from Masonic authors as to its anti-republican character. I refer to only two. Mackey says, "The power of the Graud lodge is perfectly despotic." Webb says, "The covenant is irrevocable. He cannot cast off or nullify his Masonic covenant. No law of the land can affect it, no anathema of the church can weaken it." He wished his opponent to harmonize such teachings with republicanism.

Mr. Evans, in answering, explained the language of Mackey by saying that the Grand lodge is the supreme court in Masonry, and is despotic only in the sense that its decisions are final, just as in our goverument. So every church has its supreme court, whose decisions are final and despotic in the same sense. If Mackey's language proves Masonry anti-republican, it proves everything under heaveu anti-republican. Mr. Evans did not touch the qnotation from Chase, but proceeded to sum up the points made by him in the debate. It is not necessary for me to present these, even if I were able. I think no important point has been omitted in the account I have written.

Mr. Rathbun also summed up the points he had made, and set the views of Mr. Evaus over against his own in a long list of particulars after this manner: Mr. Evans believes so and so, and says his faith does not conflict with Christiauity. I think it does. He can practice so and so in the lodge, and says that does not conflict with Christiauity. I think it does.

Mr. Evans, in his last speech, continued the restatement of points made by him, and claimed that he had met every argumeut of his opponent, and had clearly demonstrated that there is nothing anti-Christian about Masonry. More than that, he claimed that God had put the stamp of his divine approbatiou on Masonry. The Methodist church has many Masons in her bosom; God has shown his approbation of the Methodist church. A little more than one hundred years ago there were only six Methodists in the United States, now the brauch to which the speaker belongs nnmbers over 1,000,000 members. Is it a fact that this church tolerates that which God hates, and yet he blesses her? Again, there are men who love Masonry in their hearts, and yet God blesses them. He gave himself as an example; spoke of cases in which he had been instrumental in converting sinners aud in comforting the afflicted and dying, and yet he is a Mason and loves Masonry.

At the close of this speech Mr. Rathbuu asked indulgeuce to reply to the point just presented. Leave was granted, and he auswered briefly: The fact that God uses men to convert sinners and to comfort the dying does not prove them good men, nor that he approves of their opinions or practices. He said farther that God had blessed his labors in the same way; he had been instrumental in converting siuners and in comforting the dying; we are not both right. As the brother prayed the other night, one of us is right, the other wrong. Which one is it?

Each debater, in closing, spoke kind words of the moderator, the audience, and of the other. The benediction was pronounced, and all dispersed to their homes. There has been a good deal of talk about the discussion since it took place up to this date (April 26), yet no loud boasting, so far as I know, by either side.

The general opinion of Anti-masons, so far as I have conversed with them, is that while Mr. Evans had the advantage in fluency of speech and the arts of debate, being skilled at the bnsiness, this being, as he said, his thirteenth debate, Mr. Rathbuu had the advantage in the argument. He clearly established, as we think, the heathen origin, false pretensions and foolish ceremonies of Masonry, and Mr. Evaus virtually admitted every charge. Mr. Rathbnn says Mr. Evans is the most honest Mason he ever met. When such debates are held in every city and hamlet in the land, the days of Masoury will soon be uumbered. May God hasteu the day.

THE NEWSPAPER REPORT.

The Morning Sun Herald speaks thus favorably of the Rathbun–Evans debate. The sums received by the debaters did not amount to $100 each:

The joint discussion on Freemasonry closed Friday evening with the best of feeling existing between the speakers, and, so far as known, among the people. The attendance throughout the entire discussion was very large, and the audiences as well as the speakers were uniformly good-natured aud courteous. It has beeu a discussion of peculiar interest to the people of this vicinity, and has been the means of inculcating valuable information. It has been claimed that debates work evil to a community iustead of good, and that they never convince any oue. In some cases this may be so, but we think not iu this one. The people are the recipients of much information, and although there are no prononnced converts to either side the light has been spread abroad and the unprejudiced cand meditate and change their opinions at their discretion.

Freemasonry was handled intelligently by both Mr. Rathbuth and Mr. Evans. The Herald cannot, of course, attempt to give a synopsis of the line of argnment. Both speakers, in their closing speeches, complimented the audience for the perfect order which they had kept aud the undivided attention which they had given, aud added that they had never seen snch good order in large audiences duriug all their public experience. They returned thanks to the people, to the moderator, and each to his opponeut for the gentlemanly manner in which they had treated each other. They grasped hands at the close and declared that they parted better friends than when they came here. This debate was Mr. Rathbun's first. Mr. Evans had debated twelve times before.

After the speakers had finished, a vote of thanks was tendered the moderator, Judge C. Lyman, who was truly deserving. He presided with dignity and impartiality. Owing to the gentlemauly character of the debaters, appeals to his authority were very few. A vote of thanks was also tendered to the speakers for ther good nature aud good will. Judge Lymau then returned his thanks to the people aud to the speakers, and the audience was dismissed by benediction pronounced by Rev. Trumbull.

The total receipts at the door were $107.35. The people poured out from every quarter. From Wapello, from Winfield, from Mediapolis, and from every surrounding village, besides many from a distance. The expenses were $13.35, bsides $10 given to Judge Lyman as a compliment. The balance was divided between the debaters. Handsome purses were also made up amounting in all to about $100 each. Mr. Evans and Mr. Rathbun both left for their homes Saturday morning, the former at Oskaloosa aud the latter at Clarence, Cedar county.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM OBERLIN.

OBERLIN, April 20, 1883.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Oberlin is sometimes regarded as, at present, missionary ground, so far as the work of the National Christian Assoeiation is concerned. In one respect this is true, and must continue to be so until this reform has been worked out to completion everywhere,—her large body of students, changing in great part three times a year, and coming with little or no knowledge on the subject, as a rule, will stand in constant need of instruction as to the evils of the lodge. Whether there is much or little of truth in the statement as regards the balance of her population, is with some, perhaps, a question. Some work has been and is being done. There is doubtless room for more, both in and out of the College and Seminary; but it is to be hoped that Oberlin is not moving backward, at least, on this question. She has too grand a record behind her to comport at all well with that.

This reeord is a topic of great interest here at present. This term will round out the first fifty years of Oberlin College, and the term aecordingly is having an odd but very pleasing and beneficial "jubilee" flavor all through it. Yesterday was the fiftieth anniversary of the arrival of the first family of the Colony, that of Deacon Peter P. Pease, and was aecordingly declared a holiday by the College Faculty and devoted to commemorating this event. The forenoon was oecupied by committees of various classes in digging and planting class trees, aud by a large squad of students led by Professor Newton in felling and and hauling timber for a reproduction of the Pease pioneer log cabin on one corner of the eampus.

In the afternoon and evening large meetings were held, devoted to reminiscenees of former days by various old citizens, including President Fairchild, Professor Ellis, Rev. Geo. Thompson, Dea. Gerrish and ex-Professor Monroe. These recollections were of all shades, from the ludicious to the solemn and pathetic; but to me the most interesting and important of all were the glimpses of sterling character in the founders of Oberlin which were afforded by some of them. It was as if the status of those men who are gone had been grouped in an alcove, which was perfectly dark. Each letter that was read and each personal recollection given let its own ray of light in on the group, till a part, though only a part, of the moral grandeur of these consecrated characters stood dimly outlined before us. There was Shipherd, the sanguine and zealous missionary and man of faith; and Stewart, the cautious ealculator of ways and means, who together planned the beginnings of Oberlin; there was Professor (afterwards President) Finney, the Peter-Paul of five decades of the nineteenth century; back of these men, Professors Morgan and Daseomb, noble men and strong, with Father Keep, and others of the trustees and early pioneers for the Lord—a noble company, of whom it might be said as of them of old, "of whom the world was not worthy"

As shown in the extracts from their letters which were read and the recollections given, there are but two words in the English language that occur to me as at all adequately deseribing these men. These are "Christian" and "reformer." And the vigorless sentimental conception of even that word "Christian" which prevails in some quarters would not characterize them with any degree of propriety; it must have the reforming, reconstructing essence of real Christianity, which is not afraid and does not hesitate to tear down and cast off everything that stands in the way of its gospel reconstruction—it must have this idea most prominent. It is not men of soft-handed Christianity that write to friends, from the midst of arduous home-missionary labors, that "the church must be restored to her primitive simplicity and devotion," nor that kind of religion which rides off into an uninhabited wood and dedicates it for a reform colony and college which is as yet but as an inverted pyramid standing on its apex with simple faith for its foundation. Nor was it that sort of religion that led Mr. Shipherd again to write from New England, when the issue of admitting colored students was before the trustees: "Fear not, brethren, to lead in doing right; who should be forward in this if not the dear people in Oberlin? Study to learn the mind of the Spirit, and then do right. There is nothing more wicked than to follow expediency rather than the right; * * this is the great bane of the church at the present day." [These quotations are as nearly verbatum as is possible at this writing, though not exactly so.] Utterances from these men of similar tone might be multiplied, but the following covenant of the first colonists, which was read, will testify for itself to the sterling kind of Christianity which they professed and which alone made the Oberlin of the past fifty years possible:

OBERLIN COVENANT.

"Lamenting the degeneracy of the church and the deplorable condition of our perishing world, and ardently desirous of bringing both under the entire influence of the blessed Gospel of peace; and viewing with peculiar interest the influence which the Valley of the Mississippi must exert over our nation and the nations of the earth; and having, as we trust, in answer to devout supplications been guided by the counsel of the Lord, the undersigned covenant together, under the name of the Oberlin Colony, subject to the following regulations, which may be amended by a concurrence of two-thirds of the colonists.

1. Providence permitting, we engage as soon as practicable to remove to the Oberlin Colony, in Russia, Lorain county, Ohio; and there to fix our residence for the express purpose of glorifying God in doing good to men to the extent of our ability.

2. We will hold and manage our estates personally, but pledge as perfect a community of interest as though we held a community of property.

3. We will hold in possession no more property than we believe we can profitably manage for God, as his faithful stewards.

4. We will, by industry, economy, and Christian self-denial, obtain as much as we can above our necessary personal and family expenses, and faithfully appropriate the same for the spread of the Gospel.

5. That we may have time and health for the Lord's service, we will eat only plain and wholesome food, renouncing all bad habits, and especially the smoking and chewing of tobacco, unless it is necessary as a medicine, and deny ourselves all strong and unnecessary drinks, even tea and coffee, as far as practicable, and everything expensive that is simply calculated to gratify the palate.

6. That we may add to our time and health, money, for the service of the Lord, we will renounce all the world's expensive and unwholesome fashions of dress, particularly tight dressing and ornamental attire.

7. And yet more to increase our means of serving Him who bought us with His blood, we will observe plainness and durability in the construction of our houses, furniture, carriages and all that appertains to us.

8. We will strive to show continually that we, as the body of Christ, are members one of another; and will, while living, provide for the widows, orphaus, and families of the sick and needy as for ourselves.

9. We will take special pains to educate all our children thoroughly, and to train them up in body, intellect and heart for the service of the Lord.

10. We will feel that the interests of Oberlin Institute are identified with ours, and do what we can to extend its influence to our fallen race.

11. We will make special efforts to sustain the institutions of the Gospel at home and among our neighbors.

12. We will strive to maintain deep-toned and elevated personal piety, to "provoke each other to love and good works," to live together in all things as brethren, aud to glorify God in our bodies and spirits which are his.

In testimony of our fixed purpose thus to do, in reliance on divine grace, we hereunto affix our names.

This covenant was dropped after some time, as impraeticable in parts; but the spirit which it manifests is the Spirit of God, which alone made the sacrifices of its authors possible, and alone can bring moral reforms in any age to success or ean make men of any age worthy of the name of Christians. The lack of this spirit, no matter how much of intellectual culture or philosophy or refinement, or how much of money or prestige among men, may be substituted, will be the ruin of any individual, any church or any college which tries the experiment. But I must not tarry longer on this topic of Founder's Day, interesting and instructive though it be.

The recent "Finney number" of the Cynosure was quite widely circulated in the College. It was favorably received with the exception of the allusion to a lack of regard for President Finney among the people of Oberlin at present. This conveyed a wrong impression; for his name is never mentioned save with respect, and very often with expressions of the very highest esteem. The rule adopted by the First Church during his pastorate as excluding adhering Freemasons from membership, is still enforced, and it would seem faithfully, with hardly any disposition to the contrary, if indeed there is any. The pastor, Rev. James Brand, has the confidence and love of his people and of the community in general to an unusual degree. The Second Church has been for some time without a pastor, the pulpit being supplied generally by some one of the professors from either the College or Seminary.

DANFORTH.

SECRETISM AND CIVIL GOVERNMENT.

The Cynosure must congratulate its readers on the progress of their principles, and on the renewed condemnation of seeret soeieties by the government of the United Kingdom. Are the citizens of that eountry to be allowed to get ahead of Americans in their treatment of these enemies of the nations? We hope that we may at least keep abreast with them in the march of enlightened legislation. The late conservative Premier, Lord Beaconsfield, made a memorable reference to the pernicious tendencies of secret societies, and now we have the present liberal Gladstone government declaring through Sir Vernon Harcourt that "We have to deal with an organized plan against all the interests of society, and with men who announce plans for murder."

The occasion of Sir Harcourt's declaration was the introduction of a bill to meet the emergency arising from the dynamite demons. Lodgery is the parent of many of the evils which stand out to-day revealed as the combination fruit of the malignant passions of our race. Lodgery destroys true manhood; and obstructs or undermines good government, civilization and Christianity. Canada wisely refuses to charter even the Orange lodge, and the Unided Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland enacts by its constitutional representatives a new law as a terror for the dynamite secretists, and a protection to her peaceful and industrious citizens. Think of it! The enlightened Gladstone government of the great empire on which the sun never SETS, is compelled to provide a new law to meet one of the devel-opements of the Secret Empire on which the sun never RISES! T. H.

A WHISPER FROM VERMONT.

Of late years Vermont, as a State, has never ventured to speak against the lodge above a whisper. Never was poor Spain or Ireland more ridden by priests than Vermont has been of late years by Freemasons. We know of one institution of the State, an exploded National Bank, run by Freemasons, out of which only one man has been sentenced to the State's prison, while two have received office, one being sent to Congress and the other to a 1,200-dollar clerkship in Washington. The lodge has had its way in two cases, while the law has prevailed only partially in one.

But at last the church—the old Congregational church—is beginning to recover its voice; though hardly still above a whisper. It appears that a Vermont community, well ridden by the lodge, at last found itself in possession of a highly popular preacher, supposed successor to the apostles, whose chief claim to the office of clergyman consisted in one bogus degree of Doctor of Divinity, with several real ones in the Masonic lodge. But while his lodge-credentials were above suspicion, he could show none from the church! The fact of his ordination was always concealed and never revealed. It had been evident, for years, to all exeept the hoodwinked fraternity and their dupes that the man was a deceiver.

It was a strange sight to see the galvanic spasams that old Vermont sentiment made on returning to life, after lying so long suffocated under the lodge. In one and the same year the bogus Doctor's salary was raised, and he himself was excommunicated! There was no help for the widow's son. Even the Freemasons for onec declared that they would be governed by the truth! So the vote was put; and all but one old lady arose and voted for excommunication.

We have talked with several who were in the midst of the confliet, and it was only by a kind of whispered side-talk that they mention the name of Freemasonry in connection with the affair. If no more against the lodge had ever been made here, we doubt whether the community alluded to would have had the moral force to pronounee an excommunication against any one except a good man. But now they begin to see that even a Freemason may be a bad man. Perhaps the next step may lead the community to wonder how any Christian people could ever tolerate a Freemason in the pulpit under any circumstance, or even in political office. The bogus degree of the Doctor is a mueh more fitting qualification for preaching the gospel than his Masonic degrees.

Nor until churches excommunicate members for being Freemasons will they dare to speak of the terrible lodge in tones above a subdued whisper. So were men onec afraid to the Holy Inquisition. MORE LIGHT.

TEMPERANCE.

Quail eating is prohibited in St. Louis for the protectiou of quails. A Democratic Legislature refuses to let the people of Missouri prohibit dram selling for the benefit of women and children, on the ground that it is not to dictate what any one is to drink. Straining at gnats and swallowing camels is fortunately not prohibited in Missouri.

A recent issue of the London Gazette shows that public house property in the large cities of England is rapidly depreciating in value. There were thirty public houses within half a mile of Liverpool Custom-House closed within the year, because they did not pay the cost of rent, taxes, and license fees. It is to be hoped that this state of affairs is due to a better public opinion in regard to temperance.

In the recent circular sent out by the executive committee of the National Organization of Liquor-Dealers, it is conceded that "neither separate committees nor single States can sueeessfully fight the battle against prohibition," and this fact is used as an evidence that "a national anti-prohibition organization has become a necessity." That ought to prove encouraging news for temperance workers.

—Bob Burdette, in the Burlington Hawkeye, says: Men have fought, bled and died, but not for beer. Arnold Winkelried did not throw himself upon the Austrian spears beeause he was ordered to close his saloon at nine o'clock. William Tell did not hide the arrow under his coat to kill the tyrant because the edict had gone forth that the free-born Switzer could not drink a keg of beer every Sunday. The fights around a beer keg do not pass into history; they pass into the police court records. No clause in the declaration of independence declares that a Sunday concert garden with five brass horns and sixty-eight kegs of beer are the inalienable rights of free people and the corner stone of all good government. The battles of this world have been fought for grander things than free whiskey. There will be no temperance war. Whiskey makes men fight, it is true, but they usually fight each other.

—A circular of the Citizens' league of Chicago makes the following terrible disclosures: "The investigating committee learned that of the 28,035 persons arrested for crime in Chicago in the year 1877, no less than 6,818 were under twenty years of age, and that 1,782 of these were committed to the Bridewell. They also learned that in that year the arrests of minors had increased 720, aud the commitments of miuors to the Bridewell had increased 200 over the number in the preceding year. With a view of verifying these figures and learning the causes of this wholesale demoralization of the young, they made extensive tours of observation through the city by day and by night; and they soon satisfied themselves that it was the liquor and beer saloons that were transforming the youth of Chicago into vagrants and desperadoes. They found scarcely a saloon in which there were no juvenile customers, while in one of them they found 78, in another 93, and in another 147 children patronizing the bar like adults. . . . As there were at that time about 3,000 saloons in the city, it was reasonably estimated that not less than 30,000 of the children of Chicago were their regular patrons. On consultation with the police it was learned that they could readily believe, from what came under their observation, that the estimate was correct. Later it was discovered that some of the children not only drank beer and liquor, but drank to excess. In some instances they had been found lying insensibly drunk in the gutter in front of the saloons. In other instances they had been made so drunk that it was with difficulty that medical skill could save their lives. It was found that small children were nearly every day arraigned before the police magistrates for drunkenness, and sometimes lay drunk all night in the cells of the police station. What was still more alarming, the investigators were informed by the police magistrate that more than one-half of the crimes, and nearly all of the desperate crimes committed in Chicago, were committed by minors."

"Upon the persecution that arose about Stephen." The very efforts to destroy the Gospel were made the instruments of spreading it still more. It is usnally so with the efforts of men against Christianity. The attacks upon the Bible have shown its foundations secure. The attacks by means of science have shown clearly the agreement of the Bible with science and furnished new argnments for believing in its inspiration. Every doctrine becomes pure by being tried as by fire. The wrath of man is made to praise God, and the Christian sings many of his sweetest songs to his enemies' harps, as David sang the 84th psalm on the Gittite instrnment of music.—Peloubet.

"Antioch." But for the most part its population was a worthless rabble of Greeks and Orientals. The frivolous amusements of the theatre were the occupation of their life. It is probable that no populations have ever been more abandoned than those of Oriental Greek cities under the Roman empire, and of these cities Antioch was the greatest and the worst. If we wish to realize the appearance and reality of the heathenism of the first Christian century, we mnst endeavor to imagine the scene of that suburb, the famous Daphne, with its fonntains and groves of bay trees, its bright buildings, its crowds of licentious votaries, its statue of Apollo; where, under the climate of Syria and the wealthy patronage of Rome, all that was beautifnl in nature and art, had created a sanctuary for a perpetnal festival of vice.—Conybeare and Howson.

"Preaching the Lord Jesus." That is, proclaiming him as both Lord of all, as in chapter 10: 36, and Jesus, i. e., Saviour (Matt. 1: 21) for all; else there would have been no significance in the fact stated that they proclaimed him to the Greeks.—Abbott.

"Barnabas." (See Les. 4, 2d Quar.) It was peculiarly fitting to send Barnabas: (1) because of his character, as one specially adapted to console and exhort, and do the things that make for peace; (2) because he was a Grecian Jew, familiar with the Greek language, and in sympathy with the new movement; (3) because he was a native of Cyprns, which was in constant communication with Antioch, and hence a personal friend of those who first gave the Gospel to the Gentiles.—Peloubet.

"Was glad." Tell me what gladdens or grieves a man and I will tell you what sort of a man he is. It is easy for a minister of the Gospel, if he be a true man at all, to be glad when he sees his own work prospering. But a deeper humility and a loftier faith are implied when an evangelist rejoices to see another man's garden prospering while comparative barrenness broods over his own. True workers rejoice in each other's success.—Arnot.

"To Tarsus, for to seek Saul." Saul had escaped from Jerusalem, A. D. 39, and ever since made Tarsus his headquarters in preaching the Gospel through Cilicia, and perhaps beyond its borders. Of all the disciples of that day, Barnabas was best acquainted with the talents and character of Saul.—Arnot. As Barnabas was the first to take the converted persecutor by the hand and procure his recognition as a disciple by the brethren at Jerusalem (chap. 9: 27), so he alone seems at that early period to have discerned in him those peculiar endowments in virtue of which he was afterward to eclipse all others.—Cambridge Bible.

"And the disciples were called Christians first in Antioch:" The name "Christian" marked the arrival of a new fact in the world. This new fact was the formation of a self-existent, self-conscious church of Christ, independent of Judaism.—Schaff. Hitherto it had been possible, and even natnral, that the Christians should be considered—by the Jews themselves, and by the Gentiles whose notice they attracted—as only one among the many theological parties which prevailed in Jernsalem and in the Dispersion. But when Gentiles were united as brethren on equal terms, and admitted to baptism without the necessity of previous circumcision—when the Mosaic features of their society were lost in the wider character of the New Covenant—then it became evident that these men were something more than the Pharisees or Sadducees, the Essenes or Herodians, or any sect or party among the Jews.—Conybeare and Howson. The use of the term in Acts 26: 28, and 1 Pet. 4: 16, and the fact that it is never used by the disciples in speaking of themselves, indicates that it was first employed as a term of opprobrium, but was accepted and made an honored name by the disciples. So the words Methodist and Puritan were both originated as terms of derision, but became terms of honor.—Abbott.

"The disciples, every man (every one) according to his ability." Observe the two elements which enter into Christian charity; every one shares; but each one grades his contribution according to his own pecuniary ability (comp. 1 Cor. 16: 2). It is indicated also that it was a purely voluntary contribution; each contributor determining for himself his own share; there was no ecclesiastical or priestly assessment.—Abbott. Did each Christian in the church of Christ thus graduate his amount of charity, none of the institutions that a divine Providence has called out and established for blessing the world would languish.—Peirce.

AMERICAN POLITICS.

NOMINATIONS FOR 1884.

For President
JONATHAN BLANCHARD
OF ILLINOIS.

For Vice President,
JOHN A. CONANT,
OF CONNECTICUT.

PLATFORM.

We hold: 1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That God requires and man needs a Sabbath.

3. That the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is the true policy on the temperance question.

4. That the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

5. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by articles 13th, 14th and 15th of our amended Constitution should be preserved inviolate.

6. That arbitration of differences with nations is the most direct and sure method of securing and perpetuating a permanent peace.

7. That to cultivate the intellect without improving the morals of men, is to make mere adepts and experts; therefore, the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

8. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

9. That the government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

10. That maintenance of the public credit, protection to all loyal citizens, and justice to Indians are essential to the honor and safety of our nation.

11. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice-president of the United States.

QUESTIONS IN MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

The Democratic party sets up a Freemason for Presidential candidate; bnt the Repnblican party, being thoroughly pollnted by the lodge, and therefore fearing the Anti-masonic party, sets up a non-Mason for condidate, intending thereby to win over the Anti-masons to its support, jnst as a painted lady would seek to win over a virtuous young man.

Now the questiou is:

First. Has a real Anti-mason the moral right to vote for the non-Mason?

Second. Has a real Anti-mason the moral right to vote for anybody for any important office who is not an Anti-mason?

Third. Is a vote given for a Freemason possessed of any moral value?

Fourth. If a vote is given far a man that denies Christ, is not that vote itself a denial of Christ?

Fifth. If we really believe that "Jesus is king," have we any moral right to vote for a man who belongs to, or acts with the lodge which is a traitorous conspiracy against the divine Majesty of Jesus?

POLITICAL OBLIGATION.

A ministerial brother, writing in the last United Presbyterian, treats of drunkenness among Congressmen and Government officials, and declares that "these things will go on just as long as the people permit them—no longer." Very true. But a considerable class of "the people" will not object ot such practices. Thousands of our voters are drunkards, and are more truly represented in our law-making bodies by drunkards than by men of sober habits. The evils of which the brother complains, as well as others that exist, are sure to continue so long as the influence of certain classes and interests among us is permitted to prevail. For instance, the "whisky ring" is an acknowledged power in polities, is asserting itself more and more, defeats worthy Senators in their coutests for re-election, and fills their places with the palpably unworthy, keeps its acknowledged representatives in our law-making bodies, and dictates legislation all over the land. Bnt who can suppose that this "ring" would object to any man as a candidate for public honor decause he is liable to get drunk? Would not love for the flowing bowl tend to render him a more faithful representative of the liquor interest? It is well known that individuals and corporations are constantly swaying the money scepter in the domain of politics. We may not be able to say how far they succeed in directly controlling legislation; but we are certain that they stand ready to make an unscrupulous use of money whenever necessary, in order to secnre their ends. It is very certain that these political powers will not demand purity of character and inflexible integrity as the requisite qualifications of their public repsesentatives. Fitness in the legislator would defeat the purpose for which they seek to elect him—they prefer unfitness. If he loves liquor, so much the better, for under its magic influence he may become more pliant in the hands of the lobbyists And they require him to be somewhat lax in his moral principles in order that he be snsceptible to the influences through which they will seek to control him. These evils which we lament, as we perceive from the above considerations, are not accidental or unsnpported. They are firmly buttressed. They will not topple over at a touch, but will be defended. We cannot expect their snpporters to unite with us in crushing them out. The people, many of them, will not only permit such things, but uphold them. On whom, then, shall we depend to put them down?

A glance at the evils prevailing will be sufficient to answer the question. It is unnecessary to describe them. Every one has heard of the immoralities largely prevailing among pnblic men. Every one has heard of the Sabbath sitting which closed the last session of Congress, a deliberate and gratuitous violation of God's law, perpetrated without protest from a single member of either house. Every one has heard of the growing number of rich men in Congress, and probably nnderstands that they may be included, principally, under two classes; those whose wealth has given them office, and those whose office has given them wealth. And finally, every one knows something of the influence of business interests in our legislation both State and National, something of that pressnre of pecuniary considerations which crowds ont others higher and more important. Congress is little more than an arena individuals, corporations, sections and interests battle for selfish advantages. One member represents iron, and another cotton, and another whisky, and another some other interest, and these things are about all they do represent. They are men of one idea, and that idea a sordid one. Each of them is the slave of some interest to which he owes his political existence. Questions like those of Polygamy, the Sabbath, Temperance, Education, are suppressed or but feebly dealt with. And stepping over these, the two great parties have been looking for an issue, and have failed to find it, though they have "sought it carefnlly with tears."

These, and snch as these, are the evils prevailing; and does not a view of them, as we predicted, at once suggest the influence that may be expected to oppose them. While they have their friends among us, there are others who must antagonize them, who are bound by solemn professions to battle against them. Primarily, and chiefly I refer to the Christians of the land. I wish to point out the responsibility of this class. This work devolves upon them, for if they do not stem this tide of evil, whom shall we expect to do so?

The one great, efficient moral power of our world is Christianity. Ten millions in our land profess the name of Christ; but they seem to be dead so far as political influence is concerned. They were dumb as death in the national Congress when it deliberately assailed an institution they prize, and trampled nnder foot a law they venerate. It is useless to deny the strength of the Christian element among our people, but to-day it is like a Samson lying in Delilah's lap while she shears away his locks.

In a government like ours it is the privilege of every citizen to use his influence to improve it both in character and management. Moses commanded the Israelites to choose that he might appoint them as jndges. Whether they wise men and understanding, and known among their tribes, desired it or not a responsibility was thus laid upon that people which they could not shirk. So God has given to us the privilege of choosing our rulers. We may exert an influence for good or evil, as we wish. How shall we shirk the responsibility?

True, Christ gave us no specific rules to guide us in the performance of political dnty. He left no regulations for the government of a caucus. He gave no commandment snch as "Thou shalt vote the Republican ticket," or "Thou shalt have no affiliation with Greenbackers." He aimed primarily to reform the human heart; but in working for that end he has left broad principles for the guidance of men in all ages, conditions and relations. We have only to apply these principles in politics as in other things. Bnt if we confine ourselves to efforts for the improvement of the individnal heart, and let politics "go to the dogs," we shall find our efforts impeded, and perhaps frnstrated, by the external evils that will surely spring up; for government is capable of exerting, as well as receiving moral influences.

There is something in the way of political reform for Christians to do—something they can do. If they would awake from their lethargy, cease their entire devotion to personal ends, and burst the bonds of party, and if they would exercise in behalf of the political welfare a small part of the ingenuity, paticuee, energy and self sacrifice, to that they manifest in behalf of their private pnrposes, they wonld soon make their efforts tell for the welfare of the nation. Christians all over the land are voting unworthy men into office. This may arise from various causes, but it is culpable. Let them take a stand for political pnrification and elevation, and there will soon b many to come to their help. By proper care and effore they have it in their power to east the sweetening branch into many a morass of political bitterness.

It should be their aim to banish immorality and dishonesty from high places, and to secure the proper recognition of God's law on the part of public men, and they should be willing—should demand—that pecuniary considerations be relegated to a sceondary place, and that the grander interests of humanity be accorded their rightfnl supremacy. Moral questions may not be banished from the realms of politics. True, the politician of to-day has little taste for them. In many cases he could not even understand them if he would; but they constantly assert themselves in all the relations of life. God gives men something better to live and contend for than iron and wool and gold. There is always some moral battle to be fought that humanity, through the smoke and flame of conflict, may struggle up into clearer light and nobler life. Often these conflicts must be waged, at least in part, on the plain of politics. Gigantic evils are throwing down the gage of battle now, and we cannot afford to ignore the challenge. True Christian progress is best promoted by Christianity's asserting itself in all life's relations.—Christian Instructor.

The bndget presented in the British House of Commons the other day shows that last year there was a large decrease in the consumption of spirituous liqnors, and the revenue was reduced $23,000,000 from that cause.

EDITORIAL LETTERS.

POLITICAL MILLENNIUM FOR THE NEGROES—THE DEMOCRATS TO BE THEIR PATRON SAINTS—EMANCIPATION DAY FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The Washington Post is, or aspires to be, the organ of the National Democratic party. On emancipation day, April 16, this paper discourseth thus to the colored crowds who came out to celebrate District Emancipation, to exhibit their lodge finery, and hear Fred. Douglass:

"To-day the colored people of this District will unite in appropriately celebrating the great event in the history of their race, and their enjoyment of the occasion will not be diminished by the consciousness that their white fellow-citizens in every portion of the country—and especially in the 'slave States'—rejoice with them that slavery is dead. As that institution was, beyond all question, the cause of our civil war, so its extinction was the one great good result of that era of strife, bitterness and mutual destruction which all Americans, now and in all time to come, can contemplate with sincere satisfaction and devout gratitude."

Well, this is nice! If we could only forget the national Democrat who sent the U. S. schooner Grampus to seize and deliver up to torture the Mendi negroes; if some of us could forget the Democrats who mobbed us and consented to hang Abolitionists up at their own doors to choke off Abolitionism; if the negroes could forget that "Ku-Klux" was an alias of of Southern Democracy; if they could forget the Democratic raids on Kansas; the one thousand blacks who, Governor Hamilton testified, were shot down in Texas alone, in six short months, for attempting to vote in time of peace; and the four hundred voters, butchered by lodge Democrats in New Orleans for the same cause, by what General Sherman called "premeditated massacre"; if we could forget, we would confess this loving ditty of the Post would sound like sweeter wooing.

The Post does better on the sins of "omission and commission" of the Republican party, thus:

"Mr. Lincoln declared that his object was to save the Union, with or without slavery. Slavery was destroyed for the same reason that bridges were demolished, and houses blown up or burned down, and for no higher or more sentimental reason. There is no debt of gratitude due for emancipation, for the slaves were not freed because slavery was wrong, but to weaken the enemy."

Herein the Post speaks truth but not the whole truth. If it had added that Mr. Lincoln met Douglas and Democracy with the quaint saying, "If slavery ain't wrong, then nothing's wrong;" and if the Post would deign to add that Mr. Lincoln was compelled to move slow for fear the Voorhees-Vallandingham Democracy would carry the country by the negro-hating Democrats, like those of New York city, who made the pavements slippery with the blood of little negroes, taken out of asylums and treated as boys treat troublesome cats—why, that would be but the simple, honest truth, and a little of such honest confession would do its Democratic soul good. But now come the sugar-plums:

"We are not seeking to proselyte among the colored people on this day of their rejoicing—not hoping to make Democratic votes. Our purpose is to encourage these citizens to throw off the shackles imposed on them by misrepresentation and by a sense of gratitude for service that was never rendered."

Now, "did you ever!" We may as well be pleasant as grave over such fustian. The only thing joyous in this stuff, is that the Democratic party wants colored votes; that the "solid South" is broken, and we can now vote the American party ticket for God and humanity.

REBELLION RELICS.

I have just moved my boarding place to the house of a landlady who says she is "one of the worst kind of Southerners." My table-mate, on my right, led a Confederate battalion into the battle at Antietam, where, in one little run, dead men lay seven deep after the fight; and though the rest of the boarders have not reported, I presume they would all, except the ladies, have joined that battalion on that day. How our acids and alkalis will mix without effervescing remains to be proved. But my Antietam major says there are but two men known, from Mason and Dixon's line to the Gulf, who wants slavery back, to-wit, Toombs and Early. He has given me a speech by a lawyer, son of Henry A. Wise, which I could not lay down till it was done, after beginning to read it; and I am almost ashamed to own how much like a rebel the son of the man who hung John Brown has made me feel. His speech describes a regiment of boys, who, under orders, rushed from the Virginia Military Institute, to meet our forces at a little bloody encounter at New Market, Va.

My table friend, the major, stumped his Virginia district for the Union, but was beaten. "And," says he to me, "our State went for secession, and what could we do?"

I answered, "Do! Do what I and others did who ran against the jaw teeth of our States; and were crippled, starved, sneered at, and some of us, like Lovejoy and Torrey, mobbed and murdered, because we stood square by the Bible and the Declaration of Independence."

But, as we like a Mason who keeps his word better than an Anti-mason who breaks it; so I like these honest rebels better than that host of preachers who helped mob Abolitionists one day, and, in a few months shouted themselves hoarse for abolition and a chaplaincy.

AN OUTRAGE UPON PERSONAL RIGHTS.

It is said, that an inexperienced Irishman seeing a huge snake, injudiciously, but of "his own free will and accord," seized the tail of the serpent just as he was sliding under a large log. The reptile like most of the offspring of "that old serpent," was disturbed by such insolent liberties. He wanted to be "let alone." What possible harm could there be in his crawling under a log? It was his natural, inalienable right and it was an outrage upon personal freedom for a foreign-born mercenary to seize his tail and hold him back from his purposes. The Irishman, he claimed, was an invader and never having been a snake himself it was impossible for him to know anything about the mysteries or secrets of snake dens. In no amiable temper he lifted his head above the log and with flashing eyes thrust his forked tongue almost in the face of the excited Irishman, who held on with a death grip and tugged away at the tail of his formidable antagonist. While Pat kept his grip he was beyond the reach of the fatal fangs, but one slip of the fingers and he was doomed. Just at this critical juncture a comrade approaching cried out:

"Hallo Pat, what are you at now?"

Which was answered by the apt rejoinder: "Faith, and I'm waiting for somebody to help me let go of this varmint."

Pat's condition is not unlike that of many who have gone into the lodge of their "own free will and accord." They are disgusted and horrified and want to let go, but the glaring eyes of sleepless vigilance are upon them and the forked tongue of vengeance is thrust in their faces. They dread the venomous fangs of proscription, persecution and villainous interference with business, and so reluctantly hold on and wait for some one to bruise the head of the serpent and help them let go. When the "seed of the woman" applies the "rod of reproof" the venomous reptile writhes in contortions and hisses out its pernicious Mormon, rum-seller, Masonic and banditti doctrines of inalienable rights to do wrong, and "personal liberty," and when one who has escaped the snare and never been in the "snake den" essays to help the indiscreet victim, the cry is, "Oh, you have never been a Mason and can't know anything about it." So said the snake to Pat and with equal propriety.

The fact is we don't need to crawl under logs and lie down among serpents and vipers in dens and caves to know that snakes bite; nor do we need to go down into the grave of Hiram Abiff and stretch ourselves upon his putrid body, or to pass under the living arch, to know that Masonry is a curse to its members, to society, to the state, to the world and to the church. By their fruits we do know them.

Over the entrance to every secret lodge should be written, Beware of snakes and avoid the dark caverns of secrecy where they hide their deformed and loathsome bodies. As you prize the life of your soul, shun even the approach to these sepulchers of the dead.

—Secretary Stoddard reached Washington on Wednesday last. President Blanchard expects to return homeward within a few days.

—The next Iowa State Convention will probably be held in Albia, August 21st, next. Favorable arrangements are already being made for the meeting.

—Bro. M. N. Butler, State lecturer for Missouri, is engaged to canvas Page county, Iowa, and Atchison county, Mo., adjoining, and a liberal amount has been raised for his expenses.

—Joseph Cook lectures again in Chicago, May 24th. His subject will be "India, China and Japan."

—Bro. H. H. Hinman went to Iowa some two weeks ago, and after visiting several points in the southern portion of the State he expects to attend the Nebraska Sate Convention to be held May 9 and 10 at Marquette, Hamilton county. He visits Maryville, Mo., this week.

—Special attention is called to our Oberlin correspondence and the sermon of the pastor of the old First Church, and successor of President Finney. This is a great year for Oberlin and Bro. Brand was wisely and ably called attention to the most important lesson of the hour for that community so long favored of God with wise counsellors and holy men and women. No church or neighborhood can ever get beyond the necessity of often calling to mind the words of the Apostle to hold fast the form of sound words which they have heard from their fathers in the faith. This is the keynote struck by pastor Brand. May it prove the opening of a song of redemption for many souls and of triumph for victories in the name of Christ Jesus.

—The great Rathbun-Evans debate is most excellently laid before our readers through the assiduity and good judgment of Bro. Trumbull, pastor of the Covenanter church in Morning Sun. We notice that already some of the lodge organs are parading their victory, but it is not time yet for them to rejoice. Wait a year or two and if it does not appear that the lodges of every name in all that vicinity have not suffered in the quality or quantity of their membership, or both, then we must concede that they have some reason to triumph. There is another point they overlook. Their champion has made such concessions respecting the character of Masonic oaths and its pagan origin and philosophy that thoughtful men who heard him or who may read Bro. Trumbull's report will not hesitate to write the system down among the Satanic inventions for the stupefaction of conscience and the perdition of the souls of men. In our last week's report several unfortunate errors occurred in the second column. In the 6th line read "substituted" for "established"; 20th line, "regulation, satisfaction," appeared instead of "regeneration, sanctification."

GEORGE ALLEN.

"Who sees with equal eye as God of all,
A hero perish or a sparrow fall."

WORCESTER, Mass., April 1.—Rev. George Allen, Congregational minister, aged 91, died last night. He was a graduate of Yale in the class of '13, and author of the resolution in 1848 for "Free soil, free soil, free speech, and free land." He was a brother of the late Chief Justice Allen.—Press Dispatch.

Rev. George Allen of the above paragraph was the grandson of Mrs. Catharine Avery, who is mentioned in first volume of the life of Samuel Adams, familiarly called by writers, "The Father of the American Revolution." This Mrs. Avery was Samuel Adams's niece, and lived in his family as his daughter, and when the lady-aristocracy of Boston, then in the pin-feather stage, turned out on Boston Common to spin home-spun, to rival and exclude the British factory cloths, this girl took the prize. She proved the representative woman of the age of the Revolution, and her children's children beyond the Scriptural "third and fourth generation," are still named for her.

The mother of President Charles A. Blanchard has the blood and name of this remarkable woman. Rev. George Allen was her descendant in the same generation. He was a cool, lion-hearted man. He would have followed his principles to the stake, and asserted them out of its flames. In spite of Garrison's prominence, his no-voting, no government, and no-Sabbath theories, though Mr. Allen believed all else that Garrison denied, he would not shun the name or the opprobrium of Abolitionism, because it was truth and right; when D. D.'s and clergy cowered, equivocated, and shrank from it. A girl of rare merit and popularity was addressed by Martin Van Buren. She rejected him and was married to George Allen. After Van Buren became President of the United States, one rallied her on her loss of so high a distinction: "He is the same fawning sycophant still!" was her reply.

Ninety winters and summers wrought no change in Mr. Allen except in the body he inhabited. He loathed and hated the secret lodge system as he loathed and hated human slavery; and for the same reason, because both systems alike antagonized God and goodness. He did not stop to ask if masters whipped slaves, or Masons cut throats. The one denied Christ in the least of his human brethren; and the other, by substituting its false worship for the true, was cutting the globe loose from its God.

Mr. Allen has only changed his locality; and like Moses, from his skyey abode, he doubtless still concerns himself in the struggles of Christ for the mastery and beatitude of our world.

—A tribute, says the New York Independent, was paid to the memory of the late Rev. George Allen, of Worcester Mass., by the Rev. Dr. S. G. Buckingham, of Springfield. After alluding to the veteran theologian's career, almost co-extensive with our national history, for Mr. Allen was a boy of six when Washington died, Dr. Buckingham said: "He was a scholar, a rare scholar, and in many departments of scholarship. His acquaintance with the ancient Latin and Greek classics was wide and exact, always referring to them and quoting them with delight, while his familiarity with the old English writers was just as broad and delightful to him. His acquaintance with the Bible and delight in it were marvelous. His familiarity with the New Testament in the original was so great that he admitted that, if it was lost, he could furnish most of it from memory in the Greek. His position on the subject of slavery and the part he took in that long, fierce conflict, and that very sentence of his ('free speech, free trade, free soil, Free-mont'), around which the free soil party of the North crystalized, should always leave him on a pedestal more exalted and enduring than granite. We once asked him how he came by that spirit. 'To which his reply was: 'My mother was the sister of old Sam Adams, that sturdy patriot, and that's the way, I suppose, I came by it.'"

NEW ENGLAND.

THE NEW ENGLAND BOARD of the National Christian Association has its headquarters at No. 8 Portland St., Worcester, Mass. A full supply of books and tracts constantly on hand. Orders promptly filled. Correspondence solicited.

E. D. BAILEY N. E. Sec'y.

Mr. Spaulding returned this week from Western Massachusetts where his success was unusually good. In one place he sold a book to about every man he met. In another place in a single evening after working hours he sold about a dozen books. He found many persons having a lively interest in the cause, but lacking information.

A gentleman being initiated into a lodge in this State sometime ago was required as usual to leave his shirt and shirt buttons in the preparation room. The buttons were gold and very valuable. On returning to rehabilitate himself his buttons were missing and have never been found. This lesson was enough for him and he never returned to the lodge.

A gentleman willed $2,000 to the Baptist church in Amherst on consideration that the church should never have a Masonic minister. The same church dismissed a deacon for persisting in attendance upon the lodge.

Curious things sometimes come to light. The records of a defunct Masonic lodge fell into the hands of a "cowan." Looking over the record of the charity of the lodge he found one entry of a vote to give to a widow of a member "one gallon of new rum with sugar to sweeten it."

At Hardwick, Vt., O. C. Bailey lectured Monday evening, April 16th, after having spoken Sunday evening at the M. E. church to a large audience. The attendance at the lecture was very good and the results satisfactory. A good many friends of the cause were found there. Everywhere there is an interest in the coming convention and many friends are ready to co-operate in circulating the notice.

Mr. John Liscomb, of Burlington, Vt., was found to be in a very low state with consumption. The sympathies of all friends of the reform are extended to his family in their trial.

VERMONT PREPARING—SAVE THEM FROM THE LODGE.

WORCESTER, Mass., April 23, 1883.

The Vermont State convention has been definitely settled to meet in Capitol Hall, Montpelier, June 5th and 6th. This is one week later than was originally intended for the reason that the Reformed Presbyterian pastors will be otherwise engaged the previous week and it is very important that they all be present. There ought to be and doubtless will be great rejoieing at the prospect of an aggressive movement in the State of Vermont.

It is our purpose to prepare a programme which will amply compensate those who come from a distance, for their labor and expense. But true friends will not stop to know the programme. They will prepare to go like pioneers to open the way. The greater the obstacles, the greater should be our earnestness. We shall not want for speakers. Besides the men and women of the State who will bear part we shall be able to promise some foreign help to strengthen the meeting and increase the weight of our deliberations. Among the State workers are some pastors whose zeal and ability will doubtless be felt in the convention.

Those whose impressions of the work were formed years ago from efforts put forth at the beginning of this movement, are not aware of the progress which has been going on steadily during the past few years by which the people have learned to recognize this discussion and agitation as both necessary and right. The time is opportune to press forward.

A few weeks ago an Odd-fellow was converted in one of our meetings in Worcester. He had been a hard-drinking man, a greater tobacco user, very profane and was not accustomed to attend church until recently. Among the other subjects upon which I endeavored to throw light for his benefit was the evils of Odd-fellowship. After a long attempt to explain the subject I left him to meditate upon the facts given him. Last night after our Sunday evening service I again conversed with him at considerable length on the same subject. To my surprise I found that he had comprehended and remembered the facts and arguments given him before and that he had "rolled them over and over" (as he said,) comparing what I said with what he saw in the lodge. He had concluded that my statements were true so far as the religious character of the order was concerned. He found that the lodge did not claim to be a religious institution, but that it did have religious ceremonies and that in its worship it did ignore Christ. This he regretted, saying he wished they would omit the prayer altogether! After a few moment's conversation and explanation he seemed to be convinced that it was an unfriendly act to our beloved Saviour to withhold from him the honor due and that the fact that the lodge did so was a grave objection. He alluded to the "All-Seeing-Eye" as a symbol of God, and was much surprised to learn that this was a symbol among the ancients of one of their idol gods. He then said, "We do not worship the eye but only use it as a symbol." He was much surprised to know that this use also corresponded with the use made of it among the ancients. A like surprise awaited him in reference to other symbols.

I have detailed these facts to make several comments upon them. I had not supposed that this particular gentleman would from a single conversation comprehend the objections which were urged against his order, but this second conversation revealed the fact that he both understood and meditated upon it. He was doubtless aided in this by the fact that he was pointed to the ritual in proof, and with that he was familiar.

Then also I was impressed with the fact that truth needs time to leaven the lump in which it is placed. Little points of doubt and possible explanations, that would satisfy, linger in the mind and need to be carefully met and answered.

I have noticed that many secretists are ready to hear the truth when they know that the one with whom they converse will not take advantage of them but has their personal interest at heart. A mere effort to beat them in an argument does not weigh much, but a sincere yearning for their soul's safety touches a tender spot in the heart and gains a candid hearing.

A gentleman who has recently withdrawn from the lodge was first reached by reminding him of the difference between a lodge meeting and a prayer meeting—a difference in the spirit of the meeting and a difference in the character of the persons attending. The man kept up the comparison in his own mind and became satisfied that the spirit of the lodge was not healthy. A few nights ago, in telling me he had withdrawn he said to me: "The Lord has recently taken one of my little boys and left one, but I would rather he would take this one also than that he should grow up to be the companion, as I have been, of the men we meet in the lodge."

It is delightful to see the progress that some of these lodge men are making after they hear the truth stated. May it not be that many of us have been too anxious to beat our opponents and not anxious enough to save them?

The Congregational pastors of Worcester united in several public protests against a lottery scheme by an infantry company in the city. Several such enterprises have been carried on here ostensibly for the benefit of some good cause. The position the pastors took was highly commendable and has commanded the respect of the best Christian people, although it did not succeed in defeating the enterprise. Our city is so unfortunate as to have one pastor who belongs to most of the secret orders and is standing "orator" for them all. This conservator of the morals of the people, a Royal Arch Mason, distinguished himself by opposing his ministerial brethren and publicly defending gambling! If people who cannot see how good men, ministers, can be Masons would look a little closer they might sometimes find more than one reason for dropping the adjective good and substituting one of more doubtful import. It remains to be seen whether people who cannot see a man is bad because he is a Mason can see that he is bad when he openly defends gambling.

Kearney, April5. 1883.

LETTERS FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

CHICAGO JUNCTION, Ohio, April 24th.

Since daylight our route has been through a level country with occasional villages. Near Fostoria an intelligent farmer came on board and from him I learned that wheat was badly damaged all through that region. Many fields are being plowed for corn, and others where scattering plants remain are sown with flax. This gentleman predicted an unusually good yield from spring sowing and planting, as he had never seen the land in such prime order before.

Rev. Geo. P. Kimball, financial agent for Oberlin College, stepped on the cars at Shelby Junction. From him I learned something of plans for enlarging and improving the educational facilities of Oberlin. After canvassing the matter of a new "Tappan Hall" and alluding to some of the grand old reformers who lived, and studied, and prayed in those "contracted, dingy rooms with low ceilings," and what they had been worth to the world, we somehow slid into a talk on secret societies and the attitude of the churches and the college upon that question. Bro. K. assured me that both pastors and faculty are sound, personally in principle and practice, which I was more than ready to admit. I inquired about the "line upon line and precept upon precept" and the aggressive policy so characteristic of Mr. Finney and the men who caught the inspiration of heroic lives under his dauntless leadership, that made Oberlin the hated of all who loved or apologized for human slavery.

From Mansfield to Utica the wheat prospect is much improved and field and forest betoken the near approach of spring. Repairing to the house where I was entertained while attending a State Convention some five years ago, I received a most cordial welcome from Bro. David L. Belt and his excellent wife, who gave sumptuous and substantial proofs of friendship. Bro. B. accompanied me to the farmhouse of Bro. Caleb Lyon three miles in the country, where after an hour's conference I departed with a liberal offering to the Washington enterprise, which will be reported by Bro. Phillips in due time.

GRAFTON, W. VA., April 25th. After winding around or passing under or over a succession of mountains our train has halted to wood and water for a fresh grapple with the rugged regions beyond. Since leaving Bellaire at 2:05 this A. M. we have been in care of a very intelligent gentleman who told me he had a 200 mile night trip; that he has been on this run since 1871; that he knows every foot of ground and has never been asleep on duty or had a serious accident during that time. When off duty he makes it his first business to take his regular rest. He never drinks and is of the opinion that accidents would be less frequent if railroad men frequented theatres and saloons less and were more regular in their habits when not on duty.

CUMBERLAND.—Our route from Grafton has been through the most picturesque, grand and varied scenery. We were whirled along the brink of perpendicular precipicies down which one could scarce look without a shudder. Ascending from the valley regions where flowering shrubs and the gems of early spring dotted the hillsides with beauty, we came upon the snow fields and bald forests of real winter, and for hours our surroundings appeared like a swiftly passing panarama of mountains, gorges and jaggen woodlands wrapped in a mantle of purest white. The whole scene was grand beyond conception, and as I gaze filled with admiration, I thought "Your Maker is my Saviour," and so rested in a feeling of unalloyed security. The appearance of this city is really creditable to the inhabitants, and the newness of buildings is doubtless owing in part to "reconstruction" following the war. I gave a lad standing on the platform a "nickel" to point out remaining traces of the war, and he showed me the old earth works which can be clearly seen on either side of the city.

At Harper's Ferry our train paused for a few minutes only, which gave no time to inspect "John Brown's Fort and the old arsenal building," which stand near and in full view of the depot and are still in ruins. This historic spot has been so often and fully described by others that I will not say more. From Harper's Ferry I reached Washington at 2:25 P. M. and made my way directly to No. 215, 4½ Street, where I met Pres. Blanchard, vigorous in health and full of work and plans for pushing on the campaign.

MICHIGAN CONVENTION NOTES.

On Tuesday, April 17, 1883, pursuant to the call of its officers and executive committee, the Michigan Christian Association opposed to secret societies began to assemble for convention, at Luce's Hall in the city of Grand Rapids. The first day was devoted to the business of properly advertising the meetings, arranging for the accommodation of delegates and visiting friends, and preparing for the working of the first degree of Freemasonry by S. E. Starry in the evening.

At the appointed hour Bro. Starry called his lodge to order, and opened on the first degree "in due and ancient form." A good audience assembled to witness the disgusting ceremony of initiating a candidate as an Entered Apprentice Mason. Bro. Starry shows himself master of the subject. With mathematical exactness the ceremony was performed, and a challenge made to Masons present to deny the correctness of the work, but not a word came from the craft. Who will believe them if, after Mr. Starry is gone, they shall declare him a falsifier? Every candid man will say, let them speak before his face, or else

THE HOME.

CHEERFULNESS.

I think we are too ready with complaint,
In this fair world of God's. Had we no hope,
Indeed, beyond the zenith, and the slope
Of yon gray bank of sky, we might grow faint
To muse upon Eternity's constraint
Round our aspirant souls; but since the scope
Must widen early, is it well to droop,
For a few days consumed in loss and taint?
O pusillanimous heart, be comforted!
And like a cheerful traveller take the road,
Singing beside the hedge. What if the bread
Be bitter in thine inn, and thou unshod
To meet the flints? At least it may be said,
"Because the way is short, I thank thee God!"

WEEK-DAY SERMONS.

BY E. E. FLAGG.

After our customary chapter in the Bible, I took up a late number of our paper and read to my aged blind friend among its many other excellent articles the one entitled "Encouragements to Faith."

"I am glad she tells of 'the burned bread,' and the 'wearisome day,'" I said as I laid down the paper. "Now I do long to have a soul so filled with Christ and the glory of his work as to rise above all the petty annoyances of my daily living. Yet it is hard to always do so—hard for flesh and blood I mean; and it heartens one to hear another's experience—to see how little worth minding are a few thorns in our pathway when we can sow among them the seeds of such beautiful flowers of healing. Truly,

'Earth seems so little and so low
When faith shines clear and bright.'"

"Well, now I have often wondered why Christians didn't tell each other their trials and discouragements oftener," was her response; "I mean their little every day crosses. It would draw them to each other in closer sympathy; it would give a better mutual understanding; it would act as a stimulus to renewed faith and patience; and all these things they lose in a great measure by being so formal—keeping all their feelings under lock and key as it were as if they were ashamed of them.

"What makes the deadness of the average prayer-meeting? We say, 'a lack of the Spirit,' but what hinders the Spirit more than formalism? Christ's prayer was 'that they all may be one even as the Father and I are one.' How can there be that oneness without free interchange of experience and sympathy? Why should brother Jones or sister Brown go to the prayer meeting weary of body and mind, with a burden of secret discouragement on their souls, and then try to pray and talk as if they were on the heights of Pisgah? What a wonderful revolution it would work if Christians everywhere would get out of the ruts of formalism and talk and pray just as they feel! How God rebuked the formalism of the old Jews, 'It is iniquity even your solemn meeting;' and how beautifully that verse in Malachi, 'And they that feared the Lord spake often one to another,' describe the prayer-meeting that is after God's own heart—perfect liberty of spirit; some with a psalm, some with a doctrine, some with an exhortation. There could be no lack of life in such a prayer meeting as that—no bringing forth of old manna. If 'the Lord's loving kindness is new every morning' so should be our experience of it. 'Is any among you afflicted, let him pray; is any merry, let him sing psalms.' Either experience may be profitable but I believe it is always our trials and crosses that work the most good both to ourselves and others. There is so much help and strength and cheer that we lose by being too shy of one another."

I lay her words before you, dear Christian reader, with the question they naturally suggest. Does not the command, "Bear ye one another's burdens and so fulfil the law of Christ" imply a duty on our part of more frequently giving the brother or sister at our side a chance of obeying the inspired precept?

DENYING CHRIST.

What Christian would deny Christ? Peter said he would not; but he did. Oh! how many of us practically deny him. Bishop Heber once said. "It is a fatal mistake to suppose that there can be no apostasy from Christ where we are not absolutely called on to deny his name, or to burn incense to an idol. We deny our Lord whenever, like Demas, we, through love of this present world, forsake the course of duty which Christ has plainly pointed out to us. We deny our Lord whenever we lend the sanction of our countenance, our praise, or even our silence, to measures or opinions which may be popular and fashionable, but which we ourselves believe to be sinful in themselves, or tending to sin. We deny our Lord whenever we forsake a good man in affliction, and refuse to give countenance, encouragement, and support to those who, for God's sake and for the faithful discharge of their duty, are exposed to persecutions and slander."—Armory.

A KING'S CONFESSION.

The King of Corea has lately made a confession of sin which we recommend to the thoughtful attention of many official sinners, who ought to go and do likewise. Here is what he says of himself and his administration:

"I have been for seventeen years at the head of the nation, although I was wanting in ability. My administration has been a failure, and abuses have arisen in the government through my fault. I repent, but it is too late. Since I occupied the throne I have made many improvements in roads and other things, and both rich and poor have had to suffer under the burden. This is my sin. I have often altered the currency, and sacrificed the interests of the people. This is my sin. I have acted against religious doctrines. I have wasted the revenue. This is my sin. Bribery has been carried on publicly. The complaints of the victimized have not reached my ear. This is my sin. The taxes have been embezzled and the business of the people ruined. This is my sin. I am ashamed to come before the people again. I will purify my mind, and repent of my former misdoings."—Selected.

THE FATE OF AN ANCIENT WEATHER PROPHET.

The career of Wiggins calls to mind the punishment which Dean Swift and some of his friends inflicted upon a weather-prophesying impostor in Queen Anne's time, known as Partridge, the almanac maker. Partridge started in life as a shoemaker; but he soon left that for the more profitable and less laborious pursuits of quack, prophet and humbug generally. His pretensions imposed on credulous people and his almanacs were bought by thousands. He foretold storms in March and December, showers in April, hot weather in August, and frost in November, and made as loud boasts as if a hit was made.

Swift became disgusted at Partridge's pretensions, and determined to put him down. Walking around London one day, he noticed over a smith's shop the sign, "Isaac Rickerstaff." It struck his fancy, and he stored it in his memory for future use. In January, 1708, Partridge came out with his almanac as usual. A few weeks afterward London was astonished by the publication of a small sheet which purported to contain the predictions of Isaac Bickerstaff, astrologer. It made a profound sensation and the sale was great. Instead of the vague and indefinite hints at futurity which Partridge's almanacs contained, it foretold foreign and domestic events with the greatest particularity, giving even the hour of the day when deaths of famous men, great victories and defeats should occur. But one statement created the most talk; for at 11 o'clock on the 29th of March it was predicted that Partridge, the almanac maker, would die. Partridge himself stoutly denied its truth; but it was of no use. On the 30th of March another pamphlet came out giving a circumstantial account of his death, after a sincere repentance of his sins and a confession of the worthlessness of his almanac. Everybody believed he was dead, and Partridge was never able to convince the public that he was still alive. It broke up his business, and in a few years he really did die. —Boston Globe.

AN EAST WIND IN THE EAST.

Rev. H. H. Jessup, D.D., writes from Beirut to the Christian Weekly as follows:

"Have you ever thought what is meant in the Bible by an 'east wind?' Had you been here last week, you would have learned all about it by bitter experience. No wonder that Jonah's head was scorched by it. In the Arabic version we read (Jonah 4: 8) 'And it happened at the rising of the sun that God prepared a hot east wind and the sun smote on Jonah's head, and he wilted and he asked death for himself and he said, My death is better than my life.'

"An east wind began to rage here on Wednesday, August 22nd. A deadening and oppressive heat settled over the land. The next two days it grew more intense. The air was dry and hot as the breath of a furnace. The birds sat motionless in the thick trees. The green leaves of the fig trees grew crisp and dropped to the ground. Book-covers curled up as though they were being held by a coal grate. Doors, bureaus, and tables cracked with a loud noise, and warped with the heat. Even the wooden ceilings cracked as if the boards were in agony. Men and beasts panted as if gasping for breath and parched for want of water. Our children awoke almost every hour of the night, calling for cold water.

"I have rarely enjoyed anything more than I did the sight of a great flock of sparrows, driven by thirst to our yard, where there is a long trough of water. They plunged in, drank and drank again, flew around and fairly exulted with delight at finding in this arid mountain and on such a day an abundance of water. A huge centipede plunged into our wash-bowl to slake his thirst, and although obliged to dispatch him for fear of his injuring some one of the family, I could not help allowing him to live long enough to enjoy the luxury of a draught of cool water. Writing was almost impossible, as the ink dried on the pen between the inkstand and the paper.

"I had to ride four miles on horseback during the heat. Returning after sunset, I met Mr. Bliss just coming up from Beirut. His first question was, 'Is anybody left alive on the mountain?' The heat in Beirut exceeded anything in the memory of the oldest inhabitant. No wonder Jonah wilted. Thousands of Syrians 'wilted' on Friday, and I doubt not many said in thought if not in words, 'My death is better than my life' if this east wind continues."

WOMAN'S DETHRONEMENT.

By special request the following from a discourse by Rev. Morgan Dix of New York, is reprinted:

"Whatever works toward destroying the home or detaching woman from the home idea, any unfitting her for the place in the home, any making her, through ease, selfishness or luxury, or curiosity of learning, or over esteem or ambitious rivalry of man, disloyal to the spirit and ministry of home, is, practically, her dethronement, her degradation, overturning the settled order of the world and flouting the ordinances and decrees of God himself. And the true measure and glory of a woman is to order, comfort and adorn her home."

IN-DOOR NOTES.

THE BACK STOOP.

There is no part of the house more useful in summer than the back stoop. Call it piazza or veranda, if modern usage requires it, but old-fashioned people know it as stoop. The churning, the ironing, the preparation of vegetables for dinner, and other household tasks, may be done here. It is often pleasanter than the front piazza for afternoon sewing, and may be preferable to any room in the house for the meals at midsummer. We have suggested uses for the back stoop which imply that it has one important requisite—cleanliness in itself and its surroundings. The condition of this door and its appendages, of which the stoop is one, is of far more importance than that of the front door. It is more used, and is more closely related to the interior of the house.

If care be taken to allow no deposit of rubbish, no throwing out of slops that would not be tolerated at the front, the back stoop will be always presentable, and in a condition for occupation. If the builder of the house did not provide this important annex, it will be well to repair the omission before the hot days come. The essentials are, a floor and a roof; the one may be any strong, ample platform that the available lumber will allow to be built; the roof is needed principally for shade, but it should afford shelter from rains. Thin boards, with the joints battened, will answer. For the sides, place poles—cedar are the best—at the corners of course, and at desired intervals for the support of climbers. Whether this stoop is thus extemporized, or is built with the house, its beauty and comfort may be enhanced by embowering it with vines. Honeysuckles, the Virginia Creeper, the native Clematis, and other hardy climbers may be used, or a grape-vine; but, for an immediate effect, use annuals. The Morning Glories and the Scarlet Runner are among quick growers and the easiest to procure; the Wild Cucumber, so common in the Western States, is also useful. This is a department of gardening that the house-keeper should look to.—American Agriculturist.

HAVE A PHYSICIAN.

Every man ought to have his family physician, just as every man has his lawyer, his tailor, or his cobbler. Don't be feeling about in the dark, and imagine this, that, and the other is the matter; relieve yourself of painful uncertainties and burdening responsibilities, by consulting your medical adviser, when you have any persistent troublesome sensation. For the multitude of little symptoms which now and then present themselves, the best plan is to eat a little less for a day or two, take some recreation in the country, or extra rest and sleep and warmth at home; and in multitudes of cases, the symptoms will promptly abate and finally disappear altogether. But if, in spite of rest and warmth and quiet, the symptoms remain unchanged except for the worse, then promptly advise with your physician, and take nothing except by his dietation. If you do not attempt to mend your watch or even an old shoe, surely the body, so valuable to you and so delicately framed, should be put in skillful hands when repairs are needed.

Those persons who enjoy seeing a haughty spirit suffer a fall should have been on board one of the sleeping cars attached to a through train from Chicago to Boston a short time ago. Among its passengers were a middle-aged man and woman from the remote West, who had evidently come upon sudden riches, and were devoting all their energies to advertising the fact. They were gorgeously dressed; the woman sported any amount of diamonds, and no occasion for informing the other passeugers of the wealth and position of their family was suffered to pass unimproved. They had with them a plug of a boy about 14 years old. One morning after the parents had dressed themselves they discovered that their hopeful son was still slumbering, and the mother set to work to arouse him. Repeated calls failing to have any effect, she finally had recourse to thumps and digs in his ribs, whereupon the boy, evidently dreaming that he was at home and being stirred up to perform some aceustomed duty, bawled out: "You let me alone, and go feed the hogs yourself!" A joyous smile enlivened the features of the rest of the travelers.—Boston Journal.

OUR BOYS AND GIRLS.

NOTHING IS LOST.

Nothing is lost; the drop of dew,
Whieh trembles on the leaf or flower,
Is but exhaled, to fall, anew,
In summer's thunder shower—
Perehance to shine within the bow,
That fronts the sun at elose of day,
Perchance to sparkle in the flow
Of fountain far away.

Nothing is lost; the tiniest seed,
By wild birds borne, or breezes blown,
Finds something suited to its needs,
Wherein 'tis sown or grown.
The language of some household song,
The perfume of some cherished flower,
Though gone from outward sense, belong
To memory's after hour.

So with our words: or harsh or kind,
Uttered, they are not forgot;
They leave their influence on the mind,
Pass on, but perish not.
So with our deeds, for good or ill
They have their power scarce understood;
Then let us use our better will,
To make them rife with good.

THE ANTS AT HOME.

The brook that ran merrily by the garden of Woodbine Cottage, prattling like a happy child on a holiday, grew sober and quiet further down, spreading into a broad sheet of gleaming water, through whose liquid surface glistened the silvery sands that adorned its bed.

Here the soft green verdure spread like a rich carpet, and Harry and Willie Mason lay buried in the deep grasses until only their heads appeared above the waving blades. On the bank of the brook sat their uncle Ben, his kindly face turned with a pleasant smile to the questioning boys.

"So you want to hear some more queer stories about the ants?" he said. "Why, I thought we were well done with the subject."

"But you said, you know, that there was a lot more of odd things," replied Harry, "and Willie wants ever so much to hear them. Don't you, Willie?"

"I guess you does," retorted Willie, with a sly gesture.

Uncle Ben laughed heartily. "So it is one word for Willie and two for yourself," he said. "But what shall I tell you about? Shall I describe that strange tree which keeps up a standing army of ants to preserve it from injury, while it in return finds the ants in food and shelter?"

"A tree?" cried Harry, with a shout of laughter. "It must be a thinking tree, then."

"I suppose so, in its way. Not just in our way, of course. One can hardly believe such things of a tree."

"I don't believe it," said Willie, sturdily.

"What a born critic you are!" replied his uncle, with a quizzical look at the little doubter. "It is true nevertheless. The tree in question is called the bull's horn acacia. A species of ants live upon it, and protect it from insects which would injure its foliage, such as slugs and caterpillars. But the odd thing is the mode in which the tree manages to provide for these ant soldiers."

"Is they the soldiers you kept talking about?" asked Willie.

"Oh no; those were soldier ants who went out in armies, and fought battles with other ant armies, or attacked the other nests of the negro ants and carried off their young to bring them up as slaves. These soldiers only fought for the good of the tree."

"Which takes care of them in return?" asked Harry.

Precisely. There are certain cavities in its outer surface which serve as barracks for those regiments of ants. But the most curious feature is the mode in which the tree provides food for its defenders. When the leaves are young, and in danger from insects, there opens a little gland at their base, which is filled with a honey-like liquid. The ants are very fond of this, and lap it up greedily. They run from one gland to another, and are thus kept constantly about the young leaves. And these little chaps bite shrewdly, so that no other creeping thing dares to venture near the leaves."

"Well, that is certainly very curious," said Harry, raising himself on one arm half out of his grassy bed.

"But that is only part of the provision," continued his uncle; "the leaf is what is called a compound-leaf, consisting of a number of leaflets on one stem. When this compound-leaf first unfolds, there appears at its base a little yellow fruit-like body, attached by a fine point to the leaf. It is a beautiful object through the microscope, looking like a golden pear. It is not quite rife when the leaf first opens, and the ants may be seen busily running from one to another to see if they are ripe. Whenever one is found to be ripe, the ant bites it off at the small point of attachment, and carries it eagerly away to its nest. But they do not ripen all at once, so that the ants are kept about the leaves until these are old enough to be out of danger."

"Well, I never heard anything quite so queer about trees!" exclaimed Harry.

"There are many strange instances about trees being aided by insects," remarked Uncle Ben; "but I doubt if there is any stranger than this. There is one tree, of the genus Triplaris, whose trunk, limbs, and even its smallest twigs are hollow. If any person happeus to break or even to shake one of these twigs, he might well imagine that the tree was alive, for he will instantly find it covered with multitudes of creeping brown creatures which bite furiously. It is, in fact, inhabited by myriads of ants which occupy the whole interior and which protect the tree from its enemies by their vicious bite."

"I hardly think I would like to break switches from that tree," laughed Harry.

"I's mighty sure I wouldn't," said Willie.

"There is another tree, called the trumpet tree," continued their uncle. "This has a hollow stem, divided by partitions, like the reeds which grow on our river shores. Ants get into this tree by boring a hole from the outside. They then bore through the partitions and get the run of the whole iuterior. Every cell made by the partitions serves them as a separate apartment, some being devoted to eggs, and some to their young in different stages of growth. One cell is kept as the home of the queen, this royal lady having an apartment of her own."

"Do the ants protect this tree, too?" asked Harry.

"Oh, yes; they rush out in millious if the tree is shaken, and are very apt to make things uncomfortable for intruders."

"Dou't feed 'em on pears, does it?" asked Willie.

"Not exactly; they do not get their living directly from the tree; but they feed on it indireetly. The fact is, this species keeps a kind of ant eows. These are minute insects, which attaeh themselves to the interior of the tree and live on its juices. They give out a honey-like liquid, of which the ants are very fond, and lap up with great eagerness. You see thus that there are various ways in which plants feed the ants which protect them from other insects."

"Are there any other ants that live on trees?" asked Harry.

"Yes, indeed. Ants are very apt to take possession of hollow trees. They build thin partitions, which divide the interior of the tree into halls, galleries and saloons, and they live there thoroughly sheltered from the weather. The Ethiopian ants hollow out long galleries, and use the finely powdered wood which has fallen to the bottom of the tree to stop up every chink in the fioors, to make partitions, and to fill up useless apartments. They mix it with a little earth and spider's web, and thus make it into a sort of papier mache."

"Don't think that's so awful smart," protested Willie. "Jess, don't the wasps an' the hornets make paper nests, too?"

"Very true," replied his uncle. "There is another curious ant, though, which makes its nest out of leaves. These are large, strong leaves, but the little creatures somehow draw their edges together, and gum them fast, so that they make themselves a close, roomy shelter inside. They have been seeu at work, thousands of them tugging away for dear life at the edges of the leaves. If they are startled, and made to lose their hold of the edge, it flies back so strongly that it is a marvel how they ever drew it in."

"Don't they sometimes build very large nests on the ground," asked Harry—"much larger than the little ant-hills we see about here?"

"I should think so, indeed! Why, the common red ant of England builds a nest of any rubbish it can find, such as straw, leaves, and bits of wood mixed with earth, ofteu as large as a small hay-cock. But this is a trifle, compared with some tropical ant-hills. Travelers in Guiana describe ant-hills which are fifteen or twenty feet high, and thirty or forty feet wide at the base. You might well fancy they were houses for elephants, instead of ants."

"I should imagine they must be elephantine ants," remarked Harry.

"Not at all. There is a very small ant in New South Wales whose hills are eight or ten feet high. But this is not all; these great mounds are only the upper part of the ant city. It extends as deeply under ground. There is one ant described that builds a nest of forty stories, twenty above and twenty under ground. These stories are divided into numerous saloons and apartments, with narrow galleries and inclined planes for stairways. The partitions are usually very thin, but the ceilings are often supported by pillars and buttresses, just like our great halls."

"It must take the ants a long while to build such nests as that," remarked Harry.

"I guesses so," said Willle. "I'se seen 'em, many and many a time, running up with their wee little bits of dirt, and I knows they'd jess be ever and ever so long."

"But you do not stop to think what can be done by keeping at it," said Uncle Ben. "They are the very hardest of hard workers. They never seem to tire or lie down to rest, so that it is astonishing what progress they make. It is said that they will finish a complete story to their nests, with all its rooms, galleries, vaulted roofs and partitions in seven or eight hours. They use wet clay in the work, and put it together very rapidly."

"I suppose these big nests are built just like the little ones we have here," said Harry, with a questioning look.

"Yes, on much the same principle. In fact, our little mason ants are very expert builders. Some of them only build while it is raining, or while the ground continues wet. If it gets so dry that the earth will not stick together, they pull down their unfinished walls and heap the earth over the finished portions. The ash-colored mason is very curious in his ways. He begins by bringing a quantity of earth, which he heaps on the roof of his old home. Then he goes to work upon this, excavating galleries, just as a laborer will dig ditches across a field. Finally, he roofs over these galleries. But if he should begin a roof before the walls are high enough, he will carefully take it down, and build the wall higher before proceeding with his roof."

"Why, what smart little chaps they are! They must think, anyhow. Don't you believe so, Uncle Ben?"

"One would fancy so, at any rate. They may not be able to think like philosophers, but they certainly think like builders. I could give you other evidences of it. If you saw them carefully closing the doors of their nests at night or in wet weather, and opening them again in the morning, and carrying their young out-of-doors to enjoy the sun on bright days, and a dozen other shrewd habits, you might well imagine they thought it all out. Among the strangest of these ant-philosophers are the driver ants of West Africa, a species which cannot endure the hot suns of that region. If they are eaught by the fieree rays of the sun when out traveling, they at once build themselves a covered archway of clay—a long tunnel whose sides and roof are cemented by some gummy material from their own bodies. Under this they travel safe from the sun. It is said of the same ants that when they are obliged to cross a stream in their journeys, they will ascend a tree and run out on a low limb that hangs over the opposite side. From this they drop a line of ants to the ground, each clinging firmly to the one above it. Over this living line the whole army passes. Other travelers relate that if they cannot cross the stream in this way, they will drop a line of ants to the water from which a horizontal line, supported on the water, runs to the other side, forming a living bridge, over which the whole army marches. For my part, I hardly know what to think of these stories, since the driver ants are entirely blind."

"I guesses that's enough," said Willie. "Let's go play, Harry. Ants can't do that, anyway. They doesn't do noffin but work all the time."

"Indeed, you are very much mistaken, my young friend," replied his uncle. "Thy are just as fond of fun as you are. They will wrestle with one another, and ride on each others' backs, as if it were the greatest fun in the world. And they have been seen practicing gymnastic sports, climbing, hanging down by one leg, and letting themselves fall from a distance, as if they enjoyed it hugely. In fact, they are up to almost as many pranks and capers as young boys. I doubt, however, if they get into mischief as often. But go on; I won't detain you longer from your play."

"Maybe you's glad 'nough to get of us," said Willie, slyly, as he snatched Harry's cap and ran away with it. In an instant the ants were forgotten, and there was a hot chase across the grassy meadow.—Harper's Young People.

BAND OF HOPE BIBLE LESSON.

ANCIENT EXAMPLES OF THE TRUE RELIGION.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord and he delighteth in his way. Psalm 37: 23.

Ques. 1. What is the subject of this lesson?

2. Repeat the Golden Text.

3. What can you tell of the state of the world before the flood? Gen. 6: 5, 11. Ans. True religion had well nigh perished from the earth. Lawless crime, violence and bloodshed everywhere abounded. Man had lost all knowledge and fear of God.

4. Were there any exceptions? Gen. 6: 9.

5. What did God say he would do? Gen. 6: 7.

6. How did Noah save his life? Heb. 11: 7.

7. How long did he preach and warn men of their danger before the flood came? Gen. 6: 3.

8. What does true religion always lead us to do?

9. Is it likely that the world scoffed and sneered at Noah when he told them of the coming destruction? Luke, 17: 26, 27.

10. Mention another example of the powers of true religion. Gen. 12: 1. Heb. 11: 8.

11. What is Abraham sometimes called? Ans. The Father of the faithful. Gal. 3: 7.

13. Where did Abraham live? Gen. 11: 31.

14. What is the meaning of Ur? Ans. Light or fire. The name was probably derived from its being devoted to the rites of sun worship. Abraham's father, Terah was without doubt a worshiper of the sun.

15. Can you think of auy reason why God should command him to leave his kindred?

16. What does God command Christians now to do? 2 Cor. 6: 17.

17. What remarkable example of true religion occurred about 500 years before Christ? Dan. 6.

18. Why was Daniel cast into the lion's den? Dan. 6: 10.

19. Could he not have escaped such a fate by praying silently, or where no one could see him?

20. Would this have been right? Why not?
21. What do we find from this lesson distinguishes those who have the true religion from others?
They warn the wicked of their danger.
They can bear laughter and ridicule.
They separate themselves from evil companions.
They give up everything to God.
They dare to do right whatever the consequences.
LESSON HYMN.—"Dare to be a Daniel."

forever after hold their peace, and so say we. The ceremony was interspersed with pointed and apt remarks from Bros. Stoddard and Starry. At the close of the performance, the congregation retired in good order, some of them, at least with new, and not very exalted opinions of Freemasonry.

Wednesday morning session opened with a season of blessed communion with God, after which various committees were appointed, among the most important of which were, the committee on the state of the work in Michigan, and the committee on the proposed alliance. These two committees were afterward consolidated by vote of convention and proceeded with their work. Among other features of interest to our readers, the reports from the different portions of the State, as to our progress and success thus far, were very encouraging. Rev. H. D. Inman reported, that in all parts of the State the outlook was never so encouraging as now. By this joint committee the Michigan Anti-secret Alliance originated by W. H. Ross of Allegan, was recommended to to the convention for consideration and action. The matter of the continuation of The Michigan American was by this committee submitted to the convention for its action.

The afternoon session was opened with devotioual exercises, which were followed by the hearing of the reports of committees. Upon the submission of the report of the joint committee above referred to, it was received, and after by motion adopted item by item. The motion to adopt the item referring to the Alliance was followed by a somewhat lengthy discussion, which finally resulted in the calling together of shareholders present, which resulted at last in the legal organization of a body called the Michigan Christian Association, which is to be incorporated under the laws of this State.

The item referring to the Michigan American was liberally discussed, and from all portions of the field, came in such encouraging reports of the good being done through this medium, that the convention unanimously adopted the paper as the organ of the Association, and by vote elected H. A. Day as the editor of the same. Rev. A. H. Springstein of Pontiac, then gave the convention a half hour's talk in regard to his entering the lodge, and going from it; the recital of which was interesting and startling.

He passed into the institution, saw and felt its iniquitous tendency, was three times forbidden to pray in the name of Jesus Christ, realized the binding force of the order, was advised to unite with and continue in this institution by an M. E. presiding elder, heard other so-called good men praise the craft and uphold its blasphemous mummery, and then saw and heard these same men, in the prayer meeting and in the pulpit, profess loyalty to Him, who, in the lodge, they continued to mock and blaspheme, and lead others to do the same, until, as the speaker stated, he hardly dared use his razor, or go near the water, for fear of taking his own life, and when he would close his eyes visions of ropes, daggers, revolvers, and powders of poison, would float before his mind, so terribly discouraged with Masonic life had he become. He stated, as he advanced to the extreme edge of the stage upon which he was speaking, so that his toes projected beyond the edge, that so near as he then was to coming off that platform, so near had he been during all the years of his Masonic life to tumbling into hell. He said he felt this experience all those years, yet he preached the gospel all the while.

God spake by his Spirit to him and showed him the way out of this terrible condition. But he must leave Masonry. O, how dreadful is this power of secretism! The presence of a Masonic lodge in any community means death to everything good and truly desirable. No wonder Bro. Springstein shouted his triumph, when he thought upon his wonderful deliverance. In the evening Bro. J. P. Stoddard gave a powerful speech on the subject of covenants, which was listened to by a good audience. In the afternoon session, Bro. J. P. Stoddard, General Agent of the National Christian Association, spoke on the Washington movement, which has resulted in the purchase of a very desirable property in our Capitol city, and which will doubtless result in the establishing of a national political paper in Washington, and in the making of this city our future political headquarters. The convention indorsed the movement by vote. After finishing unfinished business, convention adjourned until time for evening session, which was wholly devoted to the working of the third degree of Freemasonry by S. E. Starry, of Iowa.

Thus closed a convention in which more work has been accomplished and more plans laid for future work than in any convention before in our history as an association. God bless the cause in this and other States.

THE INCORPORATION.

Report of proceedings for the incorporation of Michigan Anti-secret Association.

A meeting of the shareholders in our proposed Alliance, who were present at the Convention, was called to meet on the afternoon of April 19, in order to appoint a committee to draft a constitution and by-laws. Meeting called to order with Rev. C. C. Foote in the chair. Rev. A. H. Springstein acting as secretary. On motion the above committee were appointed as follows: W. H. Ross, S. P. Poole, Dr. M. Veenboer, H. A. Day, C. C. Foote, with J. P. Stoddard of Chicago as an advisory member. On motion this committee was enlarged to include a sufficient number to complete the work of incorporation.

The object of this corporate body was declared to be, to oppose, withstand, and remove all secret societies, Freemasonry in particular, and to diffuse Christian knowledge by various agencies, such as lectures, publications, etc.

It was voted that the Board of Directors shall consist of nine persons, and shall be composed of the president, secretary, treasurer, and six others.

Evening session called to order with Dr. L. I. Wicker in the chair; A. H. Springstein, Sec'y. Articles of Association having been drafted, Rev. W. H. Ross read them and they were received and adopted. On motion the meeting proceeded to the securing of trustees, which resulted in the election of the following persons, viz: W. H. Ross, S. P. Poole, Dr. M. Veenboer, H. A. Day, C. C. Foote, J. P. Stoddard, L. I. Wicker, Geo. Swanson, Jr., H. F. Buffham, J. Walters. H. A. DAY.

CAMPAIGNING IN CENTRAL NEW YORK.

Prompted by a call by a few that "fear not them that kill the body, but Him who has power to cast into hell," we were induced to make another visit to Willet, N. Y. Bright and early we took train at Thompson and arrived the same day (14th inst.), by kindness of brother Charles Day, who met me at Whitney's Point. Attended M. E. church on Sabbath morning and heard the new pastor, and at 2 P. M. at the Freewill Baptist church in the same village heard Eld. Paul preach. An appointment was given for me to preach in the Free Baptist church at 7-30, evening. From here went to my pleasant quarters, with my true friends, H. O. Green and lady. Made appointments to lecture at the F. B. church on Monday and Wednesday evenings. Monday evening, being very rainy, the people were not out in much force. On Tuesday and Wednesday I was quite ill. But notwithstanding I was sick enough to have been in bed, by force of will I faced my audience.

It was a hard task for me to collect my thoughts, the disease being neuralgia in my head. After suffering and fasting for forty-eight long hours, it did seem hard to face an audience, many of them not in sympathy—some bitter opponents, I presume, while languishing almost in bodily weakness. Had not "fear been cast out" I could not have stood up that night and faced an audience. Eld. Paul, the new F. B. minister came not. We presume he was unable to be there. We were not positively shut out of the church, though we had to wait outside a little, for the key after the time of meeting, and inside for warming the room and ringing the bell. Perhaps no disrespect was intended when the sexton came with the key and remarked to those of us who stood on the platform waiting to enter, "Why don't you go in?" The invitation was very cordial, had not the door been locked. This to us was a little negative, but no complaint is meant. "Sentiment is nothing without principle and principle is nothing without action." When mere sentiment fails to mature into principle and principle fails to throw out a strong and aggressive arm of action, both die in infancy. Fear of bold and needed action against popular corruptions, just when to do and to dare are needed, brings thousands of such emotional infants to an untimely death. Emotions which culminate in principles too weak to "rise up and walk," will share the same fate.

Most of the people of Willet and vicinage are by profession Anti-masonic, while a large share of those same people are actively opposed to Anti-masonic work! They whisper that they are opposed to the lodge and "cry aloud" that they are opposed to these "Antis." How loyal these people are to God and truth will appear in the judgment. We had just such loyalty as this in our late war; hence came the phrase Copperhead. Are there no copperheads in this new conflict? But there is an honorable corps of real Anti-masons in this place made of the martyr metal. I cannot name them all so I will name none. God bless this Grand Army of God's Republic. We hope some good will come of this campaign.

NATHAN CALLENDER.

THE CHURCHES.

—Rev. James Powell, Secretary of the American Missionary Association, left Chicago Tuesday expecting on Saturday to sail for Liverpool. Mr. Powell has been laboring hard for several years with but little rest. His physicians have forbidden him to attempt public speaking until he is reinvigorated with several months rest.

—Messrs. Moody and Sankey were, at last accounts, in Liverpool, where a circus, with a seating capacity of 5,000, has been too small to accommodate their hearers. An adjoining church has been well filled with the overflow. This was the last appointment of the Evangelists in England. An all-day convention was announced to be held in Liverpool on April 26th. Two days later they are to sail for America.

—Mr. Moody's meetings, according to the London Christian, "afford an education to the ministers who attend them, of more value than a college course."

—Major Whittle, who has been conducting a revival meeting in Dayton, O., for several weeks, on the 16th inst. held a special meeting in the Union Biblical Seminary, addressing the students upon topics of special interest to them.

—Rev. Mr. Watkins of the American Board mission at Guadalajara, Mexico, baptized 37 persons on the 24th of December last, the anniversary of the organization of the church, making 149 baptized during the year, 105 being adults.

—The annual meeting of the Woman's Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, whose headquarters are in this city, was held in Detroit Wednesday and Thursday. There were about 400 delegates from Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Dakota, Nebraska, and Colorado, and a number of the missionaries supported in foreign lands by the board. The board have in the past year raised $55,850 for missions and $618 was contributed by the delegates at the meeting.

—Since Sunday, the 21st of January there have been no religious rervices in any of the churches of Cleveland, Tenn., which is a town of about 3,000 inhabitants. The Mayor, Aldermen, and Board of Health were driven into a state of panic by the appearance of three cases of small-pox. They ordered the closing of all the churches, and forbade the people under penalty of fine, to assemble for public worship. Since that time there have been about fifteen cases more of small-pox, but not more than three cases at any one time. The Rev. Mr. Rodefer, rector of St. Luke's Episcopal Church, in Cleveland, writes to the Churchman to say that the closing of the churches by the authorities is a fantastic trick, and as unnecessary as it is oppressive.

—We notice with pleasure that the Central Presbyterian Church of Philadelphia has chosen Rev J. H. Laughlin to support as its missionary in Shantung, China; and a young layman in New York is to support the Rev. Gilbert Reid at Chefoo, China. We would gladly see such instances greatly multiplied. The special relations thus formed may be rendered greatly useful, not only in deepening and extending interests at home, but also for promoting greater efficiency in the work abroad.—Missionary Review.

—Bro. Wm. E Catlin has begun a union Sabbath school work in the northwestern part of Chicago which has a good foundation and deserves great enlargement and success. His experience with lodge and theater-going and dancing teachers has led to the adoption of a brief testimony against the use of intoxicants, the saloon license system or patronage of stores which sell liquor, visiting theaters and dancing, upholding secret lodges, and Sabbath desecration, especially reading the daily papers issued on that day.

—For some time there have been surmises respecting charges to be made against Rev. R. H. Newton of New York. They were drawn last week. A series of sermons upon the right and wrong uses of the Bible, delivered by the pastor of the Anthon Memorial Church last winter, furnished the provocation for the arraignment. For several weeks past a commission of Episcopal clergymen and laymen have been preparing the presentment. It now rests with Bishop Potter to do one of two things, either to ignore the presentment, in which case there is an immediate end to the matter or to designate twelve clergymen from which Dr. Newton may select five to act as his judges. If there should be a trial it will probably not be reached before July 1.

AMONG MANY ADVERSARIES.

We organized a Wesleyan Methodist church in the city of Fond du Lac on the 19th inst. This movement is the result of a blessed revival held there the past winter. The truth with regard to secrecy has not been withheld from the people of this lodge-ridden city. God has placed the seal of his approbation on the preaching of an open daylight Gospel by giving success in the midst of opposition. The works of darkness and their sympathizers are strangely agitated. They have tried in vain to lock the hall where we worship against us. Ridicule and scorn have been used to thin our audiences, but they grow under such pruning. It is amazing, but true that the touch of the Dark Empire will change the milk of human kindness and even the sweet love of Jesus into GALL. But we would ever say, "Father forgive," and strive by the grace of God to heap coals of burning love and truth on the heads of those engaged in the futile effort to stem the progress of his cause. I love the ring of the Cynosure. W. W. WARNER.

NATIVE MISSIONS.

The Missionary Review of Princeton, N. J., has an article calling attention to the society for the promotion of native missions in foreign lands, organized at Wheaton, Ill., last winter. The reasons for the society and its constitution are printed and the editor remarks as follows:

We are interested to notice evidence that this organization has no purpose to furnish sinecures to home officers. In the seventh article is a provision that "no officer or agent of this society shall receive any compensation for services rendered thereto." We remember that the American Board itself started in 1810 with this same clause in its constitution, though now it has such a large number of officials on high salaries. We hope this new organization is to demonstrate its purpose to be real and permanent. There is no more reason for paid officials in Christendom in carrying the Bread of Life to save the souls of the heathen, than for carrying supplies of ordinary food to the millions among them perishing from famine which destroys only their bodies. We deprecate the necessity for such a new missionary organization. But if there is no other way to abate the arbitrary measures of the American Board and its agents in Turkey—no other way to bring the native pastors and churches up to their rightful standing and privileges as ministers and churches of the Lord Jesus Christ, we will rejoice and thank God for any good that may be effected by this new society.

A LITERARY AVALANCHE.

"What IS the world coming to? The poorest man now is put on an equality with the richest, so far as books are concerned."—CENTRAL BAPTIST, St. Louis, Mo.

A Point. All books here advertised are ready for immediate delivery. 2nd Point. You can pay for the books after you have received and examined them. See particulars under "Fair Terms to Buyers." given below.

3rd Point. To secure my best bargains, you must always order promptly. The terms here given are good for ten days only. The "nimble six-pence" is one item essential to the low prices.

4th Point. Booksellers generally do not supply my publications. but I can allow them only small discounts, and the "pressure" of millionaire publishers, and of "interest," incline the majority against me.

Library of Universal Knowledge.

"It is the crown of the cheap and solid literature movement of the day."—PRESBYTERIAN JOURNAL, Philadelphia.

I have again secured control of the publication of this greatest of American Cyclopædias, and am again able to adopt, substantially, my old price-list. The present are uniform with the former American Book Exchange editions.

This is a verbatim reprint of the 1880 London edition of Chambers's Encyclopædia, with copious additions by American editors. It gives an amount of matter about 10 per cent. more than Appleton's Cyclopædia, (price in cloth, $80.00), and 20 per cent. more than Johnson's Cyclopædia (price $51.00 in cloth). For the general reader it is the best Encyclopædia ever published, whatever the price. Prices for the set of 15 volumes are as follows: Extra cloth, $15.00; half russia, $20.00; full library sheep, marbled edges, $23.00.

Special Offer. On condition that you order within ten days from your receipt of this paper, I will send you by express, or freight, at the following special prices: Cloth, $11.50; half russia, $14.50; sheep, $16.50. See particulars under "Fair Terms to Buyers," below:

"We admire a man of pluck and brains. He may be cast down, but he cannot be destroyed; he may be brought to the dust, but, gathering new vigor and resolution from his very misfortunes, he raises a conqueror above them all. A few months ago we were made sad by the news that the American Book Exchange, of which Mr. John B. Alden was business manager, had failed. We were indebted to this house for many beautiful and remarkably cheap books, and our dealings with Mr. Alden, extending over a period of years, were always pleasant and profitable to us. We always found him prompt and honorable. The literary monopolists—the enemies of 'good books at low prices'—had a short season of triumph. They had succeeded in strangling the great 'Literary Revolution,' but while the echoes of their rejoicings are still heard, behold, the irrepressible Alden appears in their very midst at the head of a 'Literary Rebellion,' which, in the dismay it creates in the hearts of the enemy, and in the magnitude and glory of its achievements, bids fair to outstrip the late 'Revolution.' So mote it be."—RECORD, San Augustine, Texas.

The Great British Novelists.

These choice editions of the world's most eminent novelists, are printed in the large and beautiful type shown by these three lines.

Whoever desires to possess (and who, with comfortable purse, does not?) the complete writings of the four greatest novelists of the world, wants them in dress worthy of such grand productions. Good large type, good paper and printing, and handsome binding, are essentials: if possible, one wants also the numerous illustrations of the best artists.

I have recently been so extremely fortunate as to secure the control of the entire "plant" and all of the manufactured stock of the superb "Caxton Illustrated editions" of the Complete Works of Dickens and Thackeray. The Dickens is published in 15 large 12mo volumes, large long primer type, with about 200 full page illustrations.

Dickens. It is acknowledged on all hands to be the best edition of Dickens published in this country. The binding is especially unique and beautiful, the best English cloth, with ink and gold designs, and the set is packed in a neat paper box. The following is a list of the volumes, each containing over 800 pages:

1 Pickwick Papers
2 David Copperfield
3 Martin Chuzzelwit
4 Nicholas Nickleby
5 Bleak House
6 Little Dorrit
7 Dombey & Son
8 Mutual Friend
9 Oliver Twist, Italy and Am. Notes
10 Old Curiosity Shop and Hard Times
11 Two Cities and Sketches by Boz
12 Barnaby Rudge and Edwin Drood
13 Expectations, Traveler, Miscellany
14 Christmas Stories
15 Child's History of England, etc

The price of this edition has heretofore been $22.50 per set, which I have reduced to $14.00. My edition is absolutely the same as heretofore published. The reduction is entirely in price, nothing in quality. Separate volumes, $1 each.

Thackeray's. Works may be described in the same words which I have applied to Dickens, as to type, Illustrations and binding, except that they are bound in eleven volumes. The following is a list of the volumes:

1 Vanity Fair
2 Pendennis
3 Newcomes
4 Virginians
5 Philip, etc
6 Henry Esmond, etc
7 Paris, Irish Sketches, etc
8 Barry Lyndon, etc
9 Roundabout Papers
10 Burlesque, Yellowplush, etc
11 Christmas Books

The price of the edition heretofore has been $16.50 per set, which I have reduced to $10. Separate volumes, $1 each.

Waverly. This delightful edition of Scott's Waverly Novels is just published, uniform in all respects with Dickens and Thackeray. The volumes contain over 900 pages each, with profuse, fine Illustrations. The following is a list of the volumes:

1 Waverly and Woodstock
2 Black Dwarf, Old Mortality, Quentin Durward
3 Bride of Lammermoor, Legend of Montrose, Chrouiclers of the Canongate, etc
4 Kenilworth, St. Ronan's Well
5 Guy Mannering, Anne of Geierstein
6 Rob Roy, Heart of Midlothian
7 Ivanhoe, The Talisman
8 The Monastery, The Abbott
9 Fortunes of Nigel, Count Robert of Paris
10 Redgauntlet, The Pirate
11 Fair Maid of Perth, The Antiquary
12 Peveril of the Peak, The Betrothed

It is much the handsomest edition ever published at anything less than double the price here asked. It can be supplied in sets only. An edition much inferior to this, printed from these same plates, has heretofore sold at $18.00; I reduce to $12.00.

Eliot. George Eliot's complete works are published uniform in size and general character with the above, but without illustrations. It is the only complete edition, including her poems, and much the finest published in this country. The following are the volumes:

1 Middlemarch
2 Daniel Deronda
3 Romola
4 Adam Bede
5 Felix Holt
6 The Mill on the Floss
7 Scenes from Clerical Life, and Silas Marner
8 Theophrastus Such, The Spanish Gypsy, Jubal and Other Poems.

This edition has heretofore sold at $12.00. I reduce the price to $7.00 for the set of 8 vols. It can be supplied in sets only.

Amazing offer. Notwithstanding the very great reductions in the retail prices as above, I offer you still further reduction on condition that you order within ten days from your receipt of this paper (see full particulars under "Fair Terms to Buyers") as per following net prices, to be sent by express:

Any separate volumes of Dickens or Thackeray each 70 cents.

Dickens' Complete Works, per set..... $10.00
Thackeray's Complete Works, per set..... 7.00
Scott's Complete Waverly Novels, per set..... 8.50
George Eliot's Complete Works, per set..... 5.00

"Permit me to congratulate you on being right side up again. The greatness and success of a man consisteth not in his being able always to stand up, but in his being able to get up as often as he falls or is knocked down."—DR. JOSIAH CURTIS, Nacoochee, Ga.

"You don't know how glad I am to see you on deck again, as your own captain and pilot. I enclose $4 for Irving's works in two volumes. It is cheaper than stealing."—FRED. THOMPSON, Lynn Centre, Ill.

Works of Washington Irving.

The expiration of the copyright on his writings frees them from the short-sighted monopoly which has heretofore kept the incomparable productions of this most famous of American prose writers beyond the reach of the masses of book buyers. I now have ready:

MODEL OCTAVO EDITION.—Complete in two volumes, aggregating about two thousand pages containing all of his writings except the "Life of Washington." Price, per set, cloth, $4; half Russia, red edges, $5.

ILLUSTRATED EDITION.—The same as the above, printed on finer paper, very richly bound, in three volumes, cloth, extra gilt, red edges, and enclosed in a neat box. This edition is sumptuously illustrated with 64 full-page colored engravings by celebrated artists. Price for the set, $7.50.

Extra! If ordered within ten days, I will send you Irving's Works as above by Express (see "Fair Terms to Buyers") at the following special net prices: plain cloth, $3; half russia, $3.75; illustrated, $5.65. Previous to the publication of this edition the cheapest edition of Irving was $32.50 per set.

"I am glad you have tackled Irving. The fearful prices of the monopolists have kept it off my shelves so far. I give you this week a first-class notice. You deserve it without any consideration of books in return."—P. J. SMALLEY, (Editor) Caledonia, Minn.

The Irving, in three Vols., is the finest thing I ever saw at the price. Indeed, it is not the fault of the hero of the literary rebellion if lovers of good literature go without books. There is a place in the future history of America for this same hero, should he conquer a final success, second to that of Rowland Hill in the History of England.—MRS. E. A. RUSSELL White Pigeon, Mich.

"If there is to be a Republic of Letters, you ought to be one of its chiefs Whatever . . . may say, one thing is patent to all, you are leveling up the masses to a higher plane of thought, and as a missionary of good are doing better than you think."—M. S. COWELL, Lockport, Ill.

I am watching with much interest and hope, your struggle. With one of your pluck, repulse is not defeat, and if your health is spared a few years, I am sure you will redeem every pledge you have made to the patrons of the old American Book Exchange, and reap a rich pecuniary reward for yourself.—M. E. BOYNTON, Boiling Springs, Ala.

Fair Terms To Buyers.

Any books which you may order which are not found, for any reason, satisfactory, MAY BE RETURNED if immediately, at cheapest conveyance, at my expense, and your money will be immediately refunded.

Orders under $5.00 net must be accompanied by the cash.

Orders over $5.00 net, will be filled by express, C. O. D., AND A PRIVILEGE OF EXAMINATION ALLOWED BEFORE PAYMENT is required. Business references, or a small cash payment, should accompany orders from persons unknown to me. Full remittance with your order will save the express charges on the return of the money.

Orders will be filled WITHOUT THE C. O. D., and you can pay for them after arrival and examination, if any merchant of good business standing will certify:

"M. . . . . is known to me as honorable and responsible, and will either pay for, or return immediately upon receipt, any goods which he may order."

Let this be signed and inclosed with your order. It is only a simple guarantee, by one who knows you, that you are honorable, an evidence of your good faith. The name of a "Merchant" is required, because the "Commercial Reports" tell me in a moment what is the business standing of any merchant in the United States. You, a farmer, doctor, or clergyman, may be of the highest standing, but I have no means of knowing the fact.

The Elzevir Library is sent prepaid at the prices advertised. All other books are sent prepaid at LIST PRICES, but when sold at NET PRICE on special offers, transportation charges will be paid on arrival of the goods by the person receiving them; if desired to be sent by mail, add 15 per cent. of LIST prices, to cover postage.

Transportation will cost you much less, proportionately, on a large package than on a small; it will be wise, therefore, to combine with your neighbors and make your order as large as possible.

Over 50 lbs. in weight can usually be sent more cheaply by freight than by express, but in that case you must pay actual cost of boxing and cartage. Roughly estimating, $10 worth of books at list price will weigh 20 lbs. By freight, the Railroads charge anything less, the same as 100 lbs.; therefore make your order large as possible.

THIS COUPON

Must be cut out and returned with your order (mentioning the name of the paper from which it is taken,) within ten days, from receipt of this paper in order to entitle you to the special discounts offered in this advertisement.

FARM NOTES.

SPARE THE DESTROYERS OF THE POTATO BUG.

A number of insects aid the farmer and gardener in keeping the greatest of potato pests, the Colorado beetle, in check. The Lady-bugs or "Lady-birds," in their larval state, are among the most effective enemies of the "potato bug," doing valuable service in destroying both eggs and larvæ. The mature lady-bugs are red, pink or bright color, with small black dots, and should be known and protected by all farmers.

Some of the tiger beetles do a good work against the potato beetle. The Lydella doryphora is an internal parasite, closely resembling a common fly, and is one of the most efficient destroyers of the Colorado beetle. The female fly attaches a single egg to the body of the potato larva. The small footless maggot soon hatches, burrows into the body of its victim, and finally destroys it. This fly may be seen buzzing about in the summer, and at times is so abundant in potato fields as to remind one of a swarm of bees.

A species of mite (Uropoda Americana) attacks the beetle and sometimes so covers its host that no part of the beetle is visible. This external parasite is about the size of a small pin head, and is yellowish brown.

Several birds feed upon the potato beetle, among which is the too much persecuted crow. This sable bird will even dig into the earth for the hibernating individuals. The services of the common quail are underrated in this respect. The rose-breasted grosbeak has a fondness for the potato beetle, and does much good by feeding upon it. Ducks and chickens have learned to eat the larvæ, and some fowls have overcome the native dislike for the mature insect. Thirty or forty perfect beetles have been found in a chicken's crop.

Among quadrupeds the skunk sometimes eats the potato beetle, while the common toad and black snake feed freely upon this pest of the farm.

The various poisons employed, among which Paris Green and London Purple take the lead, are effective and easily applied; but every precaution should be taken to favor the natural enemies, and thus help to so adjust the system of nature that it will favor the healthful growth of all farm and garden crops. Spare the insect and other enemies of the potato beetle, and there will be less need of applying dangerous arsenical compounds.—American Agriculturist for May.

SEEDS.—The time for procuring seeds for fields and gardens is close at hand, and we advise farmers and gardeners to be much more cautious in selecting seeds than usual. The seeds offered for sale the present year, owing to the drought, are, to a large extent, imperfect or worthless. We have examined some specimens of grass seeds which were destitute of the power of germination, and should be seized and confiscated. No farmer should be without a microscope of moderate power, as it is of great service in determining the value, not only of seeds, but many other objects connected with farms and households.

The weeds found on our farms come largely from the grass seeds, with which weed seeds are mixed. The microscope not only reveals to the eye the worthless seeds of the grasses, but by careful use it detects the weed seeds. Bad seeds are a source of great injury to farmers, and the subject should not be neglected.

YOUNG FRUIT TREES can be made to grow and do well in places where old trees have died, by sowing a pint of salt on the earth where they are to stand. After the trees are set I continue to sow a pint of salt around each tree every year. I set 25 trees in sandy soil for each one of seven years, and only succeeded in getting one to live, and that only produced twigs a few inches long in nine years. Last year I sowed a pint of salt around it, and limbs grew from three to three and a half feet long. In the spring of 1877 I set out 25 trees, putting a pint of salt in the dirt used for filling, and then sowed a pint more on the surface after each tree was set. All grew as if they had never been taken from the nursery. Last spring I set 30 more, treating them in the same way; and they have grown very finely. The salt keeps away insects that injure the roots, and it renders the soil more capable of sustaining plant growth.—J. B. M. in N. E. Homestead.

THE POTATO.—Dr. Hendee, of Callierville, Ala., in a letter to the Journal, expresses his gratification at the distribution of the potato found to be indigenous in Arizona, and remarks as follows: Costa Rica, in Central America, is the native home of the Irish potato. The Spaniards found it there in daily use as food. The wild tubers were preferred, and they still are found in great abundance, not very large, but of exquisite flavor. The climate of the little State is pleasantly cool, the greater part of its territory consisting of a plateau 12,000 feet above the sea.

STRAWBERRY-BEDS may be rendered much more productive by the application of a good top-dressing of unleached wood-ashes as soon as the winter covering is removed. If unleached cannot be had, use leached ashes. Apply early and in plenty. Covering material should not be allowed to remain on the plants after weather becomes settled, but removed and utilized later for mulching the soil between the rows.

ANCIENT LAW MAKERS.

About the beginning of the Fifth Century, the Salians, after their settlement in Gaul, under their King, Pharamond, they framed a body of laws which have since been known as Salic; but at that time those law-makers knew nothing of the wonderful discovery which works harmoniously with nature's laws, and which is a positive boon to those suffering from Rheumatism, Gout or Neuralgia. We refer to that common sense remedy, Salicylica.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

—A cyclone of the most destructive character swept through southwestern Mississippi on Sunday afternoon April 22, and laid the four towns of Beauregard, Wesson, Tiltman and Lawrence in ruins. Thence it struck north and east through Georgia and wrought great devastation at Albany, Eastman and other towns and villages. The number of persons killed is estimated at over a hundred, and the wounded at more than double that. No catastrophe of like character has been recorded in many years.

—Between Olivet and Bellevue, Mich., early Friday morning, the breaking of the pipes connecting the engine with the air-brakes effected the stoppage of the passenger train on the Grand Trunk road, when a freight following dashed into its rear, telescoping two sleeping coaches, which were completely wrecked, and injuring thirteen persons, five mortally. Notwithstanding that the freight train was flagged, a heavy grade and bad curve precipitated the collision.

—The Irish convention at Philadelphia Thursday adopted the organization of the National League of Ireland, and passed resolutions making a fierce arraignment of England's rule in the Green Isle. They indorse the Parnellite policy, and eschew any reference to dynamite as a factor in Irish politics.

—Near Franklin, Ga., the house of B. J. Roop, a prosperous farmer, was carried off by a sudden overflow of Hillahatchie Creek, and, striking a tree, went to pieces, drowning Roop's wife, three children, and a negro servant.

—The Michigan Senate defeated the prohibition amendment, but in the House the joint resolution proposing the amendment was advanced to third reading. The House returned to the Governor the bill permitting villages to suppress dram-shops and it is now virtually a law. The prohibitory amendment resolution failed to pass next day in the House by not receiving a two-thirds vote.

—An attempt was made to blow up the tower of the Flint mill at Fall River, Mass., but it only resulted in killing the watchman.

—Ex-Senator Paddock, of the Utah commission, has gone to Salt Lake to join the other members and prepare for the work of taking the June registration for the election, which occurs in August, at which time members of the Legislature will be elected. Efforts will be made to get up a clean registration, to shut out polygamists. This is regarded as the most important step in the movement against polygamy.

FOREIGN.

—Frederick William, Crown Prince of Germany, was cordially welcomed at Vienna Friday by the Austrian Emperor.

—The ships County Aberdeen and British Commerce collided in English waters, and twenty-five of the latter's crew were drowned.

—An explosion occurred in a mine at Bessiges, France, and 127 employes are missing. Nine bodies have been found so far, but many more deaths are feared.

—In Kelly's second trial at Dublin, for participation in the Phœnix Park murders, the jury were again unable to agree, though the judge summed up severely against the prisoner. Michael Fagin, alleged to be another of the conspirators, was then placed on trial and on Friday he was convicted of participation in the Phœnix Park murders and sentenced to be executed May 28. He said he was a Fenian and would die one.

—Devine, a Fenian informer, detailed at Dublin the plottings of that party against Judge Lawson, Juror Field, and the police leaders, and stated that one of its members had been sentenced to death by the clique for not obeying orders in committing a murder. The evidence was presented at the trial of Debney and Kingston for conspiracy to murder.

—The London Times says the government is possessed of information showing that the Fenian organization in the United Kingdon numbers 150,000 men, besides offshoots bearing the titles of Vigilants and Inviucibles.

DR. JOHN BULL'S

Smith's Tonic Syrup

FEVER and AGUE

Or CHILLS and FEVER.

AND ALL MALARIAL DISEASES.

The proprietor of this celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE, CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. He refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to cure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and whole families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the general health. It is, however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medicine will not require any aid to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

The genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN J. SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP, of Louisville, Ky. Examine well the label on each bottle. If my private stamp is not on each bottle do not purchase, or you will be deceived.

We desire to call your attention to this useful work, and ask you to help us in its circulation. We want Agents to canvass every community.
By selling this book one can do much good. It is by such literature that we must expect to awaken a popular sentiment against secret societies, and overthrow them. By selling this book one can make money. Liberal terms will be allowed, and any energetic Agent can sell many copies. Masons will buy it from mere curiosity. Anti-Masons will buy it for the facts and arguments presented. Many will buy it to send to their neighbors. Those on the fence will buy it that they may learn the truth on the subject. Those not interested in the discussion, and young people especially, will buy it for the story.

"It is an attack on Freemasonry with a sprinkle of Slavery thrown in to make it go down well."—A. R. Presbyterian, (S. C.)

"So intensely interesting did I find it that it was hard to pause until the last sentence was read. This work places the author high among the writers of the best class of fiction."—W. W. Barr, D D., in Christian Instructor, (Philadelphia, Pa.)

"A charming work fit to be classed with 'Uncle Tom's Cabin,' it is indeed less a work of fiction. The volume is as valuable as a work of reference as it is agreeable, truthful and useful. Our young folks will not leave the book, if they begin it, till they 'see how it turns out.'"—Cynosure, (Chicago, Ill.)

IN BRIEF.

Moody and Sankey, the revivalists, arrived in New York on Sunday from Liverpool. Their voyage in the steamship Alaska was the quickest trip on record —six days, twenty-three hours and forty-eight minutes from Queenstown. The same evening Mr. Sankey addressed a meeting in Cooper Institute, giving a running account of the second campaign of these evangelists in Great Britain and Paris. Greater results even were accomplished than during the former visit. At first two daily meetings were held, but the attendance grew so rapidly that sometimes eleven meetings were held each day. The English clergy received them kindly, and the students of Oxford and Cambridge showed a genuine and noble enthusiasm in promoting the great work of salvation, attending meetings by thousands and laboring during vacation to get people into the meetings. In some cities of England it was not unusual for 12,000 persons to attend a single meeting. Twenty-two cities were visited in Great Britain and Paris in France, where the difficulties of language were largely overcome and great enthusiasm excited. Mr. Moody's arrival has been anxiously awaited by his brethren of the Chicago Avenue church in this city, where he and Major Whittle are elders. He retains a warm regard for this flock of his early love and Gospel labor and will visit them at the earliest opportunity, assisting them possibly in the selection of a pastor, they having been for some time without.

The papers have for a few weeks told us of frequent arrests of young boys on their way West, bold and bloody deeds in their fancy and a walking arsenal without, the end of their journey being the extermination of Indians, robbing of trains, and a freebooting life in general. Without an exception their inspiration for such a life was the cheap, trashy boy's weekly papers, the life of the James brothers, or such vile stuff. These cases are arousing some attention from the teachers and guardians of children. At Cleveland the managers of the public library have banished the novels of Miss Evans, Mrs. Southworth and Mrs. Holmes; and it will be a reason of rejoicing when similar institutions throughout the country follow this lead, and clean their shelves of all such sensational stuff, which is ruin to mind and soul of every young person who becomes absorbed in them. A bill is before the legislature of New York making it an offense to put in the hand of a minor a dime novel or other book of fiction. The measure is so carelessly drawn that it may almost be regarded as in favor of the worst kind of trash—the cheap weekly papers. We need a prohibitory law against such stuff as well as against liquor and tobacco.

Santa Fe is the oldest settlement in the United States. It was a considerable Aztec town when the Spaniards occupied it in 1550, seventy years before Plymouth Rock sounded under the Pilgrim heel. When the first two hundred and fifty years had passed Santa Fe was yet under Spanish rule and no one thought of anniversaries, but a different class of owners, now that the cycle of a thousand years can be again divided, are about opening a "Tertio-millennial" anniversary celebration. The programme is a characteristic one and is the best evidence of the kind of morals and religion taught in that region for the past 333 years. No less than twenty days will be more or less occupied with races and dances, and most of the remainder with military parades and sham fights. As these performances are to be continued for thirty-three days it may be conjectured that the quiet citizens of Santa Fe will rejoice when the spree is over. Cannot the society for introducing a Christian education in the Territories, or the Woman's Christian Temperance Union whose eloquent leader, Miss Willard, is already on the ground, do something to redeem this celebration from a dead round of folly?

The Irish National League formed at Philadelphia during the last week of April was a meeting as remarkable for its objects as for its enthusiasm and membership. The effort of 2,000,000 Irish people who have become citizens of another country to secure independence for the country they have left is an interesting instance of the strength of early associations and of the love of native land. Established on foreign soil and across an ocean the ends sought by the League: to instruct the American public on Irish grievances, to encourage Irish and "boycott" English manufactures, and the "abolition of sectional feeling" among Irishman, are as practical as could be expected. But it cannot be denied that greater effect upon American opinion would have been produced if as positive a condemnation of the dynamite policy had been made as we hear from many of the Irish leaders in the old country, instead of simply preventing Rossa from taking any part in the meeting; if also a man with a better record than Sullivan, the murderer of Hanford at his own door step in this city in 1876, had been chosen president; and if the condemnation of England had been in accord with present facts rather than an appeal to passion from the history of bloody wars two centuries ago. Evidently the language of the resolutions was chosen for its effect upon the Irish mind, not the American, and hence the violent and exaggerated style, used for its effect for the same reasons that it is used often by political conventions. The public at large will find it difficult to believe of the English nation that "there is no form of cruelty known to the lowest savage which it has not practiced on the Irish people in the name of the highest civilization. There is no device of fiendish ingenuity it has not adopted to reduce their numbers." The separation of the League from the disciples of dynamite seems to be complete. On Sunday the "Irish Revolutionary Brotherhood" met in New York and denounced the Philadelphia meeting. A branch of this lodge was established and 100 members initiated.

The Zuni Indians, whose system of lodgery has been reprinted in these columns from the Century magazine, are put in sore distress by Senator Logan of Illinois, who is accused of claim jumping by his newspaper adversary in this city. The correspondent of this paper has been visiting the Indians and puts their case before the public in a way to arouse much sympathy. This little tribe, numbering some 1600 souls, live on the western borders of New Mexico, a sterile region swept by frequent sand storms. A little valley artificially watered by four springs produces a small crop which barely subsists them. Here they have lived since the time to which the memory of man runneth not—it is certainly believed that their ancestors occupied the same spot hundreds of years before the Spanish conquered the territory about 1540. This remnant of the Aztec race are peaceful and respect the whites, but are a dirty and degraded race, having nothing that could excite any interest in them (aside from the fact that they have immortal souls) but their secret religious rites which they have ground out for centuries, and which in the eyes of a scientist are invaluable as a record of tribes long dead. Cushing in pursuing his investigations has become a member of the tribe and of the most powerful of their lodges, though the initiation nearly killed him. As part of the ceremony they bound him naked for eight hours upon a big red-ant hill, and made him drink some infamous decoction that almost destroyed his stomach and poisoned his whole system. President Hayes desired to settle upon the Zunis the title of the lands they tilled and the four springs; by some mistake, two of the latter were left out of the survey, and Logan and his friends have entered them for a stock ranche. Shut away from the springs the Indians must starve or move elsewhere. This must be all a mistake on Senator Logan's part. Mr. Cushing is proving that the Zunis are good Masons. Logan is susceptible to the argument of the grip; though he is represented to be inexorable in this matter, he will gracefully yield if some squallid chief will pinch his knuckles or draw his hand across his stomach.

FRIENDSHIP, LOVE AND TRUTH.

BY E. RONAYNE.

"Our friend awaits our mystic rites. Then at once the chains prepare. Here they are. Entwine their links about him. Man in darkness and in chains! How mournful the spectacle, yet it is the condition of millions of our race who are void of wisdom though they know it not."

Such is the language of Odd-fellowship as applied to every one of its candidates immediately upon entering the lodge-room, at the time of their initiation into its pagan and senseless juggleries, and although ignorant doubtless of the true import of what is said at the time, yet it sets forth in a most truthful and forcible manner the condition of unregenerate man and I have no doubt of the great majority of Odd-fellows. Every unsaved man is "in darkness and in chains," bound by the chains of Satan and led captive by him at his will in the kingdom of darkness. This is manifest from the following testimony from God's Word. First, with regard to the devil himself, we read in 2 Pet. 2: 4, "God spared not the angels that sinned but cast them down to hell and delivered them into chains of darkness to be reserved unto judgment." This is the present condition and the future destiny of the devil—reserved in "chains of darkness" and awaiting the judgment of the "bottomless pit," and "the lake of fire." Rev. 20: 2, 3, 10. This is also in part the terrible condition of the unsaved, and their future destiny will undoubtedly be that of their cruel and relentless master if they die rejecting Christ. This awful and eternal doom the devil would like to keep hidden from the minds of his poor deluded subjects, and hence he makes some people believe that there is no eternal punishment—that the wicked are to be totally annihilated; while another class of people he persuades into the equally terrible falsehood that all shall be finally saved, and that at last even the devil himself will resume his former position of blessedness and happiness around the throne of God and of the Lamb. There are two things which the devil does not want to have preached to-day, namely "eternal life" and "eternal punishment." And yet the same divine revelation which so blessedly sets forth the one, describes in language which cannot be mistaken the awful realities of the other. So sure as the unsaved man is now "in darkness and in chains," and so sure as he dies in that condition, just so sure will he remain in that condition forever and forever. "Then said Jesus again unto them, I go my way and ye shall seek me and shall die in your sins; whither I go ye cannot come." Jno. 8: 21. And again in Jno. 8: 24, "If ye believe not that I am he, ye shall die in your sins." And then as to the eternal duration of their judgment it is most clearly set forth in Rev. 20:

15 and in Rev. 14: 11. "And whosoever was not found written in the book of life was east into the lake of fire. And the smoke of their torment ascendeth up forever and ever and they have no rest day nor night." Dearly beloved reader, there is no rest in hell, don't believe the devil, he is a liar from the beginning and a murderer. Let the Lord Jesus Christ be your only portion; find in him your true and only Sabbath. Trust him, rest in him. He took your place that you might take his; he was bruised that you might be blessed; he became what you are that you may become what he is; he died under the hand of God in your room and stead that you might live forever. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." Jno. 3: 16. Every unsaved person, every unregenerate man, every one who is not "born again of the Holy Ghost by the Word of God" is in a perishing condition, in the kingdom of darkness and enduring the terrible bondage and the cruel tyranny of a most relentless master, and hence Odd-fellowship speaks the truth when it represents man as being "in darkness and in chains." In 2 Cor. 4: 3, 4, we read, "If our Gospel be hid it is hid to them that are lost, in whom the god of this world (the devil) hath blinded the minds of them that believe not lest the light of the Gospel of the glory of Christ who is the image of God, should shine unto them." The god of this world—the devil—blinds the mind and keeps men in darkness by lying about God and causing them to believe his own lie in preference to God's truth. But again in Eph. 5: 8. "Ye were sometimes darkness, but now (that ye are saved) ye are light in the Lord." And again in Col. 1: 13: "Who hath delivered us (believers) from the power of darkness and hath translated us into the kingdom of the Son of his love." And again in 1 Pet. 2: 9: "But ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, an holy nation, a purchased people [a people for God's own possession—Rev. Version] that ye should shew forth the praises of him who hath called you out of darkness into his own marvelous light." All this divine testimony, with scores of other passages that might be quoted, goes to establish one terrible fact beyond a doubt, namely, the awful condition of the unsaved, both by nature and by practice—in a state of absolute and profound darkness, bound by the chains of Satan and led captive by him at his will; and dying in this condition he goes out into outer darkness forever and forever where there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. God don't send him, he simply goes himself. He dies as he lived—lost—in darkness—and so he remains lost and in darkness for all eternity. This terrible truth as regards man's condition the ritual of Odd-fellowship most vividly represents when the candidate is received into the lodge room hoodwinked and chained. Here without really understanding what it does it gives a correct representation of the truth, but this is far from being the truth referred to in the language of the "Right Supporter of the Noble Grand," when in closing the lodge he declares that it is again to be opened at such and such a time for the purpose of diffusing the principles of Friendship, Love and Truth. When the ritual of Odd-fellowship speaks of "truth" it means the truth of Odd-fellowship and not the truth of God's Word. It means that Odd-fellowship is true—that its religion is true, that its principles, its teaching and its philosophy are all true. It sets forth the supposed fact that by living up to the laws, rules and regulations of Odd-fellowship a man will be delivered from the darkness and freed from the chains of sin and Satan, and that when at last he comes to die he will be transferred by the hocus-pocus of Odd-fellowship into the Grand Lodge above. This is Odd-fellow truth but the devil's lie. The Lord Jesus Christ is THE TRUTH and wherever he is rejected there is no truth. He says himself in Jno. 14: 6: "I am the Way the Truth and the Life, no no man cometh unto the Father but by me." He is the "Way"—the way from the bosom of the Father to the sinner's condition and the dust of death; and he is the way back again from the dust of death to the bosom of the Father. Odd-fellowship rejects and repudiates the Lord Jesus Christ and is therefore "the way of Cain." Jude 11. The Lord Jesus is God's way "for neither is there salvation in any other." Acts 4: 12. Odd-fellowship is Cain's way and leads to banishment and the curse. Gen. 4. The Lord Jesus Christ is the TRUTH—the truth of God—"the brightness of his glory and the express image of his person," (Heb. 1: 2,) but in no part of the ritual of Odd-fellowship can the name of Christ be used even as a form; and therefore, if God's Word be true, Odd-fellowship must be the spirit of anti-Christ and its pretended truth the lie of Satan. And last of all the Lord Jesus is the LIFE—the life of God—"that eternal life which was with the Father and was manifested unto us." 1 Jno. 1: 2. Man in his natural state is "dead," "alienated from the life of God," (Eph. 2: 1 and 4: 18,) but believing God's testimony concerning his Son, (1 Jno. 5: 9, 10,) and receiving the Lord Jesus Christ as his own personal Saviour, (Gal. 2: 20,) he becomes at once and forever united to Christ having received the same life, the same nature, and is made a joint-heir of his glory for all eternity. Read carefully 1 Jno. 5: 12; 2 Pet. 1: 4 and Rom. 8: 17. The moment the sinner believes in the Lord Jesus Christ he becomes identified with him in everything as Christ was identified with the sinner in everything. So that when Jesus was crucified, it is as if the believer was crucified (Gal. 2: 20); when Jesus was buried it is as if the believer was buried (Rom. 6: 4); when Jesus was quickened it is as if the believer was quickened (Eph. 2: 6), and when Jesus was seated at God's right hand it is as if the believer was seated at God's right hand (Eph. 2: 6). Union with Christ makes a Christian, union with Masonry makes a Mason, union with Odd-fellowship makes an Odd-fellow, and union with sect makes a sectarian. Union with Christ and communion with him must not be confounded. The former never can be broken, the latter may and often is. The former is the result of Christ's work for me, the latter is the result of my walk with him. In union with Christ we are delivered from the power of darkness (Col. 1: 3); delivered from judgment for sin (Jno. 5: 24) and we are made free from the bondage and power of Satan (Jno. 8: 32, 36) forever. In union with Odd-fellowship men are chained still more securely in darkness—they willfully reject God's only remedy for man's terrible ruin and they go down to the grave having made a covenant with death and an agreement with hell. Isa. 28: 15.

Thus then the Friendship of Odd-fellowship is the friendship of the world and hence enmity with God. The Love of Odd-fellowship is the love of the world and therefore hatred of God, and the Truth of Odd-fellowship is simply and solely the devil's lie to retain man still more securely "in darkness and in chains." Dear reader, be sure that you are resting in Christ's finished work for you on the cross—not in feelings, or visions, or experiences—but solely and only in the work that Christ has done, and you have his own blessed assurance that you shall never come into judgment but have passed out of death—darkness—into life." Jno. 5: 24.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP AND THE MYSTERIES.

BY E. D. BAILEY.

The idea of secret societies is not modern. They have always existed under various names and shapes. They used to be denominated the mysteries—a term signifying just what we mean by secret societies. Every country in the world is said to have had its own system of secret societies, but all writers agree that the character of these societies was the same and that there was a marked resemblance in the ceremonies.

These mysteries or secret societies were invariably connected with the idolatry of the country in which they existed and were themselves the promoters of that idolatry. Their existence was never authorized by Jehovah, but invariably condemned, and their baneful influence on the chosen people of God finds frequent mention in the Old Testament Scriptures, wherein the worship of "the host of heaven," "Baal," "the groves" and the "high places" are repeatedly reprobated by the prophets.

It is not difficult to see that the secret societies of our time bear a close affinity to the ancient mysteries. They practice very similar initiation ceremonies, they swear the candidate to secrecy, they blindfold him and then "bring him to light," they claim to be moral and to promote religion, they are graded into degrees, they require a similar creed, i. e. a belief in Deity or God—in every particular they have a marked resemblance to their prototype. This resemblance all writers on the subject have recognized. Odd-fellowship is no exception to the rule. Its secrets, its mode of initiating, its belief in a God, its method of teaching by symbols, its having a chaplain or priest—all this reminds us of the ancient mysteries. A. B. Grosh, the leading writer of the order, did not fail to notice and allude to this resemblance:

"The earliest records of human history furnish proofs of the existence of secret associations among nearly all the nations of the earth."—Grosh's Odd-fellow's Manual p. 13.

"Hence, in nearly every nation in Egypt, Assyria, Greece, Rome, Gaul, Germany and Britain—religious mysteries were the foundation-doctrines, and the priesthood were the founders of secret societies."—Id. p. 14.

"In one word, what regeneration by the word of truth is in religion, initiation is in Odd-fellowship. In this, as in many other particulars, our institution has instinctively, as it were, copied after nearly all secret associations of a religious and moral character. In Egypt, the most ancient among the ancient nations, an institution of this kind existed from the earliest period. * * Besides the Egyptian mysteries, as they are called by historians, we find scattered throughout all Europe, and a large portion of Asia, associations founded on similar principles, characterized by similar ceremonies, and having similar objects in view. * * Among all the mysteries of the ancients, those celebrated at the city of Eleusis, and hence called Eleusinian mysteries, are best known. These were copied from the Egyptians and bore a general correspondence to all similar institutions; and hence an account of one is, in the main, an account of all the others. Not that all agreed in the particular detail of their practices or objects, but in their outline they agreed in holding similar principles for similar purposes."—Id. p. 90.

It would be easy to show in detail the resemblances of Odd-fellowship to these ancient systems of idolatry. Enough, however, has been given to show that in condemning the order we are only condemning the same system of idolatry which the prophets and apostles condemned. There is nothing which can be affirmed of this order which could not be affirmed of the ancient mysteries. It requires a belief in God, so did they; it professes good designs, so did they; it ignores the atonement of Jesus Christ and his mediatorial office, they also rejected the slain lamb on the altar of God, typical of our Saviour; it blindfolds its candidates, so did they; it pretends to teach lessons by symbols, so did they, it has secret signs and grips, so had they.

No such resemblance to the Christian church can be found. The church of God is open, the lodge is secret; the church takes the Word of God for its government, the lodge its own laws; the church points to Christ as able to open the eyes, the lodge blindfolds the candidate; the Spirit and the bride invite all to come, the lodge excludes four-fifths of the race; the outward ceremonies taught by Christ are few and simple, lodge ceremonies are many and strange; the Word of God opposes the ancient systems of idolatry, the lodge claims affinity to them.

Is it not strange that our fathers and brothers should practice to-day in the secret lodges just such ceremonies as they condemn the ancient idolaters for practicing? Yet such is the fact. Our ancient fathers were deceived by the same pretensions and joined those systems in the same blindness as our own friends are doing now. We need not be deceived by the fact that they are good men. Good men are often the most readily deceived because themselves so honest that they cannot suspect others of deception. Let all good men come out from these idolatrous institutions.

IN CONTRAST.

BY MRS. L. D. D'WOLF.

M. Gambetta, the lover of the French Republic has passed away. That he has been of some political service to his country is undoubtedly true. Yet when a man stands in a high position, and is looked up to as an oracle, and he believes false doctrine, and leads an impure life, that man's life, whoever he may be, is a failure for good after all. This, M. Gambetta, seemed at the supreme moment of his existence, to understand. His death cry, "I am lost" rings out with clear and mournful cadence over the ocean waves to us. At first we weep for our young sister Republic and say, Who will take Gambetta's place? But when we stop to reflect upon his life our thoughts turn into another channel. We weep for France less but for M. Gambetta more. For Gambetta, whom God endowed with the intellect and the heart to appreciate and grasp great moral principles and truths. This his patriotism has revealed to the whole world. And while we would honor his love for his country, let us not as a Christian people who regard purity and religion, accept his influence as worthy of our highest regard. "When men get loose in their theology the screws are started up in everything." Gambetta's skeptical views doubtless have been the cause of his moral ruin.

In contrast with this man's life let us place that of the venerable missionary, Rev. Titus Coan, and see what loyalty to true principle has achieved for a people, and ask ourselves which name shall stand in loving remembrance in our hearts, he whose love for his country and selfish pleasure made the man, or he whose heart, soul, life, influence, all went to make men better, holier and happier for this life, and the one eternal, and whose last words were not, "I am lost"—but, "I have no fears, not one! not one! Glory! Glory! Hallelujah!"

This is an age in which great men are toasted, feasted and celebrated after death. It is the anniversary of their victories, or their birth, and men sing their praises or chant their requiems at pleasure. How often it is in memory of some unworthy person whose life was untrue. We forget the ribald songs, the odes to the glass, while we remember only "The Cotter's Saturday Night." It takes the whole life to make up the man, it takes all the poems to make up the poet. I do not say to show forth his talent, a single poem may do this, or a couplet. We profess to be a Christian nation, a God-fearing people. Have we not declined in morality and religion through the influence of just such celebrations? I ask, Is it right to do this, leading our young men by it, to prize virtue less, and genius more? If we would cast our laurels at the feet of a conqueror, let it be before the man who has brought thousands, as Rev. Titus Coan has done, into the light of life.

HEROD'S BIRTHDAY.

(Showing how the ancient lodge was worked.)

Bright shone the day o'er Galilee;
'Twas Herod's birthday festival,
And hums of joyous revelry
Resounded through the crowded hall.

For chief and magnates all were there,
The princely Priest and Tribune bold;
Sweet perfumes floated on the air;
The tables groan'd with meats and gold.

And diamonds there lay thick as dew
Upon the hills of Bethlehem
When shepherds hailed a birth-day new,
Which angel songs announced to them.

But little recked the king of that:—
Some lie that from false prophets came;
Such idle tales were stale and flat;
He gloried in great Cæsar's name.

The curtains drew, and forth there sprung
An angel form with smiling face;
She paused the astonished crowd among,
Then danced with every witching grace.

As David danced before the Lord,
So she before a drunken crowd,
While wonder murmured 'round the board,
Or rose in raptures high and loud.

Oh, she was fair, this Bayadere!
Though glorying in her beauty's shame;
And glorying plaudits rent the air,
As thus she worshipped Herod's fame.

Exultant midst his revelry—
"Now on my oath!" the monarch cries,
"Ask what thou wilt, I'll give it thee,
Though half my kingdom were the prize."

In secret spite "behind the vail,"
Politic cunning prompts reply;
No more can false regrets avail;
Triumphant vice bids virtue die.

Power triumphed over virtue then,
Before these magnates "in the East:"
And the head of the first of men,
Became the chief dish of the feast.

That head had dared to speak the truth,
And must be food for mockery;
For so decreed King Herod's oath,
To a dancing girl of Galilee.

AMERICAN.

LOYALTY TO JESUS.

BY WOODRUFF POST.

Rev. Dr. Draper, of the Washington Heights, N. Y., M. E. church, has recently advanced some potent thoughts which, whether designed or not, have most unmercifully and gloriously thrust Masonry through and through and through and pinned it to the wall. It, we are reliably informed, created a great stir in Syracuse, N. Y., where there is Masonic approval in high places. The paper appeared in the Northern Christian Advocate of that place in the Dec. 7th number of the past year. The title is, "Loyalty to Jesus" —a superior theme ably discussed. Dr. Draper says:

"Loyalty includes allegiance, yet is not only a principle, but a feeling, a sentiment....a hearty impassioned fidelity and obedience....loyalty to the Divine Person....It includes credence with respect to his teachings....The ultimate appeal would be to the Jesus-Word....Here is the Christian's infallibility. ....To whom shall I go? Thou hast the words of eternal life....A popular preacher before a Jewish audience recently declared: 'We are one people, with one God, and one immortality, and one road thereto'....But there is not 'one immortality and one road thereto' alike for Christian and Christ-rejecting Jew, or other Christ-rejecting sinner. Loyalty to Jesus precludes Christless charity. This is simply sickly sentimentalism, which paliates the guilt of Christ-rejection. It degrades the work and dishonors the person of the divine Lord and vitiates the atonement."

The Doctor is perfectly familiar with affairs in Syracuse and being strongly opposed to "rings" and "clans," had, I have no doubt, that abominable religious order in view, one of whose voices, Sickels, declares, "If we with suitable true devotion maintain our Masonic profession, our faith will become a beam of light and bring us to those blessed mansions where we shall be eternally happy with God, the Grand Architect of the Universe."

It is well known that Freemasonry discards our Lord Jesus Christ, even excluding the obnoxious name from their Scripture readings and all their prayers. See their guides, rituals, etc. Nevertheless some of our D.D.'s chant, "Be true Masons and you will be the true servants of God; then it matters not when nor where you die, you will drop away from the earth, but heaven will have gained a new voice to swell the chorus of the redeemed." And the American Wesleyan of Syracuse says that Chancellor Sims, of the University, is reported an enthusiastic admirer of the Baalism of Freemasonry and the hobgoblinism of Odd-fellowship, and that "Not long since he is said to have disgraced the pulpit....by commending these blood-crimsoned secret works of worse than heathenish darkness." It is no wonder then that Dr. Draper's declaration of loyalty to Jesus created such a stir there where the "sickly-charity," Christ-disdaining clan has a seat.

"Loyalty to Jesus precludes such charity" and such Christ-professing, Christ-rejecting—what shall we call them? What are they? Anomalous to a marvelous extent. They dabble in sickly sentimentalism and "degrade the work and dishonor the person of the divine Lord, and vitiate the atonement." Draper says, "The last half century has witnessed a succession of attempts to displace Christ from the hearts and homage of his disciples." Aye, and every intelligent person whose attention has been arrested, knows that Freemasonry is of the anti-Christ which shares largely in that terrible work. "Be true Masons and you will be the true servants of God," (so extendedly advocated by many, besides deists and grosser infidels,) is a doctrine extendedly taught by "great men" and seemingly "good men," says Dr. Draper, "helpful in the world of knowledge, humanitarian, with a keen sympathy for the suffering and the oppressed, and influenced by the principles of Christianity, who still ignore its founder, brushing aside the divine Jesus and his atoning death."

This is the class, our professed Christians—not real —and legion Gospel ministers, that is doing more to lift the flood gates of formalistic, ritualistic, sickly sentimental Baalism to deluge the precious doctrine of salvation by Christ alone, like the dragon of the Apocalypse (Rev. 12) than all other influences combined. "Christ is wounded in the house of his friends." But we must not forget that "God out of Christ is a consuming fire," that is to say "Our God is a consuming fire (Heb. 12: 29) who cannot look with allowance upon the abomination of the rejection of his dear Son," for whosoever "denieth the Son the same hath not the Father; (1 John 2: 24) and he that believeth not [on] the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him." John 3: 36. Thus "God out of Christ," will be the destruction of those secret religionists who eject the Son, yet profess allegiance to God the Father.

There certainly is need as Dr. Draper says, "that orthodoxy should gather firmness," for it is alarmingly true that "evangelical Christianity has liberalized to catch liberals, [charitable] and has itself been caught." But truth will triumph. Thank God for men like Dr. Draper, and may they vastly multiply.

THE IRISH AND LODGERY.

George Alfred Townsend, the press correspondent, has from a Catholic priest these reasons for the opposition of that church to the secret societies.

A sensible priest, who has his worldly side, remarked to to me during the week: "You can now see why our church denounces and forbids secret societies. It was to save strong, wild races like the Irish, and the Italian peasantry, from indulging in the law of their origin and doing secret crimes under the incentive of a dark autocracy, such as they so readily fall under the sway of in politics. You see Tammany Hall, and what blind obedience it can get out of Irishmen? Now make a secret lodge inside of that, oath-bound and exempt from the church's confessional, and teach it to kill, to use poison, and to send nitro glycerine, and what a Tophet could be made of this smiling world! The fear of hell, whose fires we threaten them with, alone withholds some of these bloody savages. Yet the tale of English tyranny entraps even some of our priests, as it has done Protestant priests, into Peep-o'-Day, or Molly Maguire, or other kindred orders. We see that the Irish race would become wild as it once was if we let it drift into a Carbonari." "Then you think the treacherous instincts is in the race?" "I do. The Kelt is a strong politician; but he is dissatisfied with plain, tranquil government, and wants a boss and violent counsel. See how those American Irish are treating Parnell! He would give his country a European hearing and train it to self-government. These safe-exiled satraps demand blood, combustion, and terrorism, and Parnell is made their martyr. Independence is worth nothing to Ireland if her people must be demoralized first."

AMONG THE ZUNIS.

[From the Century for May.]

No sooner had I begun to enjoy these evening diversions of the pueblo home than they were interrupted for several days. I then first learned of the existence of thirteen orders or societies, some of which were actually esoteric, others of a less strict nature, but all most elaborately organized and of definitely graded rank, relative to one another. For the introduction here of a few words relative to these organizations, I beg the pardon of the reader; since their existence is a fact of ethnologic importance, and moreover my statements relative to them have been most acrimoniously criticised and persistently disputed.

Functionally they are divisible into four classes: Those of War, of the Priesthood, of Medicine, and of the Chase; yet the elements of every one of these classes may be traced in each of all the others.

Of the first class (Martial) there is but one society—the "A-pi-thlan-shi-wa-ni," or the "Priests of the Bow," at once the most powerful and the most perfectly organized of all native associations, in some respects resembling the Masonic order, being strictly secret or esoteric; it is possessed of twelve degrees, distinguished by distinctive badges.

Of the second class (Ecclesiastical) there is but one order—the "Shi-wa-ni-kwe," or society of priests, of the utmost sacred importance, yet less strictly secret than the first.

Of the third class (Medical) are the "Ka-shi-kwe" and "A-tchi-a-kwe," or cactus and knife orders—the martial and civil surgeons of the nation; the "Ne-we-kwe" and "Thle-we-kwe," or the gourmands and stick-swallowers; "Bearers of the Wand," who treat diseases of the digestive system; the "Ka-ka-thla-na-kwe" and "Ma-ke-thla-na-kwe," or grand ka-ka (dance) and grand fire orders, who treat inflammatory diseases; the "Ma-ke-tsa-na-kwe" and "Pe-sho-tsi-lo-kwe" or the lesser fire and insect orders, who treat burns, ulcers, cancers, and parasitic complaints; the "U-hu-hu-kwe," or "Ahem" (cough) order, who treat colds, etc.; and lastly, the "Tchi-to-la-kwe," or rattlesnake order, who treat the results of poisoning, actual or supposed, resulting from sorcery or venomous wounds.

Of the fourth class (Hunters) there is again but one order—the "San-ia-k'ia-kwe," or "Tus-ki-kwe," blood or coyote order—the hunters of the nation.

To all these a fourteenth organization might be added, were it not too general to be regarded as esoteric, notwithstanding its operations are strictly secret and sacred. I refer to the much quoted, misspelled, and otherwise abused "Ka-ka," "the Dance," which is wonderfully perfect in structure, and my be regarded as the national church, and, like the church with ourselves, is rather a sect than a society.

Perhaps the Priesthood of the Bow is the only truly esoteric of all these bodies, since members of it may be admitted to meetings of all the others, while members of the other societies are strictly excluded from the meetings of this.

Early learning this, I strove for nearly two years to gain membership in it, which would secure at once standing with the tribe and entrance to all sacred meetings, as well as eligibility to the Head Chieftaincies. I succeeded, and the memory of my experiences in this connection are to me the most interesting chapter of my Zuni life.

These orders were engaged in their annual ceremonials, of which little was told or shown me; but, at the end of four days, I heard one morning a deep whirring noise. Running out, I saw a procession of three priests of the bow, in plumed helmets and closely-fitting cuirasses, both of thick buckskin—gorgeous and solemn with sacred embroideries and war-paint, begirt with bows, arrows, and war-clubs, and each distinguished by his badge of degree coming down one of the narrow streets. The principal priest carried in his arms a wooden idol, ferocious in aspect, yet beautiful in its decorations of shell, turquois, and brilliant paint. It was nearly hidden by symbolic slats and prayer-sticks most elaborately plumed. He was preceded by a guardian with drawn bow and arrows, while another followed, twirling the sounding slat which had attracted alike my attention and that of hundreds of the Indians, who hurriedly flocked to the roofs of the adjacent houses or lined the street, bowing their heads in adoration, and scattering sacred prayer-meal on the god and his attendant priests. Slowly they wound their way down the hill, across the river, and off toward the mountain of Thunder. Soon an identical procession followed and took its way toward the western hills. I watched them long until they disappeared, and a few hours afterward there arose from the top of "Thunder Mountain" a dense column of smoke, simultaneously with another from the more distant western mesa of "U-ha-na-mi," or "Mount of the Beloved."

Then they told me that for four days I must neither touch nor eat flesh or oil of any kind, and for ten days neither throw any refuse from my doors, nor permit a spark to leave my house, for "This was the season of the year when the 'grandmother of men' (fire) was precious."

Since my admission to the Priesthood of the Bow, I have been elected to the office of guardian to these gods; have twice accompanied them to their distant lofty shrines, where, with many prayers, chants, and invocations, they are placed in front of their predecessors of centuries' accumulation. Poetic in name and ascribed nature are these cherished and adored gods of war: one is called "A-hai-iu-ta," and the other "Ma-tsai-le-ma," and they are believed to be single in spirit, yet dual in form, the child or children of the God of the Sun, and to guard from year to year, from sunrise to sunset, the vale and children of those they were first sent to redeem and guide. These children receive without question the messages interpreted by their priests from year to year, which unfailingly shape the destinies of their nation toward the "encircling cities of mankind."

* * * * * * * * * * * *

Had a ghost appeared in their midst he would not have caused more surprise than my assurance and seeming familiarity with the forms excited in the members of the order. They occupied one of the largest rooms in the town, along the walls of which were painted figures of the gods, among them a winged human monster with masked face, and a giant corn-plant which reached from floor to ceiling and was grasped on either side by a mythologic being. Toward the western end of the room stood the altar, with attendant priests before, behind, and on either side of it. Above all was suspended a winged figure, like the painting on the wall. Between the altar and the blazing hearth were gathered the members, all of whom, save the women, were nearly nude; but elaborate devices in red, white, and yellow paint, representing serpents, suns, and stars, made them appear dressed in skin-fitting costumes. They were at work grinding and mixing paint, adorning costumes, and cleaving blocks of straight-grained cedar into splints about a yard in length and nearly as thin as grass straws. Others, again, were tying, with strips of "yucca" leaf, the splints thus prepared into bundles about as large as one's arm.

As soon as I had deposited the presents, I approached and saluted the chief-priest, grasped his hands with both my own, and telling him I would "return at evening for the paint," breathed on them and hastily withdrew. On my way home an Indian who had seen me enter cursed me heartily, and said I would suffer for my imprudence, but I paid no attention to him. He told my old brother, however, and when long after dark I threw my serape over my shoulders, the latter asked where I was going. I said, "To see the rattlesnakes." "No!" said the old man. "Yes," said I; "if the priest be willing why should you object?" and amid family imprecations I darted out of the door and hurried along the dark streets to the place of meeting. I climbed the ladder and entered, blinking at the flood of light with which the place was aglow. Several of the members started up and motioned me out with their flat hands; but I only breathed deeply from my own, until I reached the place of the old priest. Knowing that Mexican was forbidden, I pretended not to understand what was said, when the latter advised me, in his own language, to go home; on the contrary, I wrung his hand, and, as I pulled off my moccasins, incoherently expressed my thanks for the privilege of remaining, and immediately seated myself as if for the night. It was a heavy "game of bluff;" but utterly bewildered by it the old priest said nothing for some moments, until, evidently in despair, he lighted a cigarette, blew smoke into the air, uttered a prayer, and then handed the cigarette to me. I smoked a whiff or two, said a prayer in English, and handed the cigarette to the nearest member. I had the satisfaction of hearing them say, "Let him stay; he is no fool, and what if he be—he is our Ki-he, and the 'Beings' will throw the light of their favor upon him, because he cannot understand and knows no better." So they rolled another cigarette and told me I "must smoke all night, and help to make clouds for their little world;" that I "must occasionally give to the fathers (priests and song-masters) my cigarettes, roll more, and never be idle, nor cease smoking." I had never smoked before. The first cigarette made me desperately sick; the second, sicker; so that when rose to present it I reeled and had to sit down again; with the third the sickness disappeared, and with the fourth I first came to feel the dreamy pleasures of the smoker.

At midnight, a long succession of cries like the voices of strange night-birds penetrated our smoky den. The musicians began to beat their great drum and sing a weird, noisy song, celebrating the origin of their order. Soon a grand company of dancers filed in, costumed like the members of the Rattlesnake order, save that black streaks of paint encircled their mouths, bordered and heightened by lines and daubs of yellow pigment. After passing through a rapid dance, which was attended by the round-headed "Sa-la-mo-pi-a," they settled down along the opposite side of the room. Only the "Sa-la-mo-pi-a" now remained, dancing wildly up and down before the altar, waving his wand of yucca and willow, with which, on occasion, he soundly thrashed the unfortunate sleepers whom his keen little round eyes failed not to discover.

There was now a sudden pause in the music. The Sa-la-mo-pi-a retired, and only members of the two orders remained. Two lads who were undergoing their novitiate, were brought into the middle of the room. The fires and huge grease lamps were freshly kindled and lighted, until the smoke near the ceiling looked almost like the clouds of sunset. A nude functionary brought great armfuls of the splint bundles and deposited them in front of the hearth. The music struck up—wilder, more mysterious and deafening than ever. The two boys looked wistfully about; one trembled visibly, while the other, more imbued with the spirit of his race, seemed possessed, after the first movements, with a dogged apathy. Two members of the order approached them from behind, pinioned their arms, and stood holding them. All the other members rose, each procured a bundle of the splints, breathed on it, prayed over it, and all, save the leading priests, sat down again; these set up long, terrific cries, rushed toward the fire, howled at it as if in defiance, and stuffed the ends of the splints into the flames and embers. Soon their torches set the place more aglow than ever. They approached the terrified boys, danced, and joined in the wild song, brandishing their flambeaux, and yelling more and more vociferously. Suddenly, two by two, they stepped into the light, thrust the blazing splints into their mouths and throats, drew them forth still aglow with coals, and put the latter out in the mouths of the boys. The stoic stood unmoved, but the other writhed and turned his head piteously; to no purpose, however, for the stalwart priests held him firmly to the fiery ordeal. Two by two, all the members in the order of their rank, even the song-masters, went through this process, until just before day-break there remained only the prayers to be said over the wretched pair to complete their initiation. This completed, they were conducted to seats, and all present said their prayers before the altar. Meal was thrust into my hand, and I was dragged up with the rest. A long silence ensued. Sleepy participants nodded, grimaced, fell against one another, re-straightened up, only to repeat again and again the same experience, before daylight sifted in and sunbeams followed through the holes in the blanket curtains. Finally, a woman's voice called down from the roof. One by one she passed down huge bowls of meat-broth, red with chili, guava and Indian delicacies, until four rows extended from the end of the room to the altar. She then came in, accompanied by a plumed priest of another order. Together they said a prayer of presentation, which the priests present replied to with one of thanksgiving. The "bad influence" of the feast was skimmed off with eagle plumes and "thrown up" the altar by a medicine priest. Then the leader called out, "Eat all!" The weary crowd woke up of one accord, and with boisterous jokes, loud smacking, and gurgling exclamations of satisfaction, soon cleared away a good portion of the liberal feast. A bowl of hot broth and meat was set before the novices. It was red with pepper, powder, or chili. They took a mouthful each, and with tears in their eyes desisted, for their lips were as black with cinders as their tongues were white with blisters, but they were bidden to eat. The more timid one refusing, was grasped by the nape of the neck by one priest, while another stuffed the hot, smoking food down his throat.

Horrible as are these ordeals, they are less so than those of the Cactus order, where the young candidate is scourged with willow wands and cactus thorns, until his naked body is covered with a net-work of ridges and punctures. Far from blaming my foster-people for these things, I look rather to the spirit of their at first imposed, but afterward voluntary sufferings; that they may place themselves beyond the evil they strive to overcome in others; may strengthen the faith of their patients to the sublime power of their medicines, given, they aver, by the gods themselves for the relief of suffering humanity. So, annually, they and their brother orders give public exhibitions of their various powers—sometimes, as is the case with the slat swallowers (or "Bearers of the Wand"), producing injuries for life, or even suffering death; but, nevertheless, unflinchingly, year after year, performing their excruciating rites.

LETTER FROM THE SMYRNA MISSIONARIES.

A letter from Bro. A. D. Zaraphonithes brings cheering news of his work of self-denial and love. In making up a small fund for him it has occurred to us that other friends might have missionary money which they would be glad to send to this brother. Any funds sent to the Cynosure office plainly designated will be forwarded to Smyrna with great pleasure. Bro Zaraphonithes writes:

SMYRNA REST, SMYRNA, Turkey, April 13, 1883.

DEAR BRO. KELLOGG:—We sent you a letter the last part of February. In that letter we wrote you about our school. We now have 58 pupils and they still come. We got a Greek teacher who came a week ago, she is a Christian girl, was educated in the Greek schools, then she spent a little more that two years in Magnesia in the ladies' school of the American Board.

It seems that the Lord has a great work for us to do here. We have the roughest boys of the city and they are also poor. It is wonderful how quick they learn to sing both Greek and English, and when we pray they have learned to bow their heads, fold their hand and shut their eyes. We therefore pray that God will send us a good teacher from America to teach English, for there are so many classes that it will be difficult for us to continue on alone; as I must go about the city to do missionary work, and so cannot do much toward teaching in the school.

We have written to some of our lady teacher friends asking them if they have faith enough to come and help us, trusting in God for their living, and also we have written to them to report to the Cynosure at once when they decide to come, and Mr. Kellogg will please let her know if there has been any name sent in before her. As our work is a faith work we ask for a teacher that can have this same faith, trusting in God for her living. She can live with us as a member of our family. Our school begins the middle of September.

We expect to go to Andros to spend the school vacation and keep that place on fire. Any letter leaving America for us after the middle of June can be directed to Andros, Greece, (through Syra).

We ask you to pray for our work here so that God may bless us.

With Christian love,

A. D. ZARAPHONITHES.

READY FOR MONTPELIER.

WORCESTER, Mass., April 30, 1883.

It was our hope to have been able to speak with some definiteness about the programme for the Vermont convention, but we have not completed the arrangements about speakers and must therefore wait another week. Instead of having the degrees publicly worked we are to have them described and discussed, which will probably be better than merely to exhibit them. It is our intention to give a full description of the Entered Apprentice and Master Mason degrees and also to describe the initiation into the Odd-fellows' lodge. These two items of themselves will be of great interest. We have also invited two ladies to address the assembly, presenting the reform from their stand-point. This, we hope, will prove an important feature of the convention. Several ministers and laymen are also to be invited to speak, so that our sessions will be crowded full. O. C. Bailey is still travelling in Vermont and will return to Montpelier in ample time to complete the local arrangements and awaken an interest in town in the meeting.

All our letters indicate a marked interest in the State. Why may not this convention be a notable one? It certainly will be if all the friends will make up their minds to attend. Nothing will atone for the absence of those who can and ought to be present. Let no one begin to excuse himself on any account. If you make up your mind to go you can go. The convention should be in every respect a representative one.

It is my intention to go to Chicago after the Vermont convention. Any persons in the West who may wish my services in preaching or lecturing during June and July can write me about it. I shall be absent for a month or more, attending the annual meeting of the N. C. A. and other things.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP BENEFITS.

If the I. O. O. F. is of any value to humanity it is on account of the "benefits" paid its members. It would be absurd to claim that young mechanics and laboring men would be benefited by the absurd ceremonies of initiation. Probably four-fifths who join the order, do so with the expectation of personal benefit to themselves or their families. If men would examine the facts before joining they would see how little financial advantage there will be to themselves. The principle of these benefits is that of insurance, not charity. The initiate becomes a party to a contract by which he pays the lodge a certain amount and is entitled to a certain benefit in return. Here is what the Sovereign Grand Lodge says on the subject:

"The by-laws of a lodge may be regarded as a contract between the initiate and the lodge; they define generally the reciprocal duties and obligations of each; they prescribe the amount of the contribution levied upon each member to the common fund, and the amount of his claim upon it when sick or disabled. Ordinarily the tax does not exceed ten cents, nor does the benefit exceed four dollars per week."—Sovereign Grand Lodge Tract.

Considered apart from the ceremonies of initiation, the secrets of the order, there might be no objection to a weekly payment into a treasury of ten cents per week, by five hundred persons, more or less, with an agreement that if one of the parties should be sick he should be entitled to $4 per week of sickness. This is the financial agreement of Odd-fellows with their lodges. Such an agreement should not be denominated charity, but insurance. Under its proper title everybody can judge of the value of the bargain for himself. If there are other incidental advantages, there are also other incidental disadvantages, so that this statement of the Sovereign Grand Lodge covers the body of the insurance policy.

Shall we insure on this plan? This is a fair question and should be fairly answered. First, let it be noticed that there are other insurance companies, which charge no initiation fee, over and above the weekly dues, which do not sell puerile initiation secrets for $25, which do not degrade their members by foolish ceremonies, but whose transactions are all open to the inspection of the uninitiated and which offer just as good insurance against accident, sickness or death as the Odd-fellows. Hence young men need not compromise their manhood by joining secret societies when they can insure more cheaply and securely in open companies. Let no one be beguiled by the word charity, for there is no charity in the transaction; it is a business transaction of the nature of insurance.

It cannot be denied that many persons who have been taken sick have found $4 a week a help to them. But these persons should remember that what they receive is not a gift of the lodge, but only a partial return of what they have deposited. We say partial return, for we propose to show that on an average Odd-fellows only receive about $3 for every $5 paid into the lodge. There may be individuals who receive more but the majority receive much less. The individual exceptions which may be called to mind can be offset by other exceptions where poor men have contributed of their scanty earnings till too poor to contribute more and in the end have received no benefit because too poor to keep up their dues! Such cases by the score are known.

We come now to facts and figures. At the semi-annual session of the Grand Lodge I. O. O. F. of Massachusetts, held in Boston, Feb. 1, 1883, occur these statements, made by the Grand Master:

"We can turn with pride and satisfaction to the result of our labors in the past six months. One thousand two hundred and forty-four of our number have been relieved in the hour of affliction, and $27,224.52 expended therefor. Three hundred and eighty widowed families have shared our charities to the extent of $3,021.05. One hundred and forty-four of our number have been taken from us by relentless death; $6,091.90 expended to give them proper burial, and for other charitable purposes the sum of $3,882.91 donated, making a total of $40,255,41 expended in our blessed mission of benevolence and charity. The world may condemn and prejudice scoff, but hallowed in the sight of heaven are such acts of enduring charity; and in the great day of accounts, in which all the doings of man shall be revealed in connection with the motives that actuated them, the faithful Odd-fellow will rejoice in his labor of love.

This is an extract from the speech of Francis Jewett, Grand Master. A full extract is given to allow full weight to his statements. This is a sample of Odd-fellowship boasting. Now let us take the Grand Master's advice and refer to the Grand Treasurer's report. In doing so we find the Grand Master has given every item which would be of advantage to the lodge and only omitted what would make the whole transaction appear to disadvantage. He gives the total relief correctly, $40,255.41, but the receipts were $109,802.26, i. e., nearly two and three-fourths times as much as was paid out in benefits. Hence it appears that the members of the order contributed $2.75 for every dollar which was paid out for charity. This is the transaction which the Grand Master characterizes as "our blessed mission of benevolence and charity!" Where is the bank or insurance company in the country which makes a semi-annual profit of 275 per cent. on its stock? Who would not want to be charitable if he could make a clear gain of $2.75 on every dollar paid to the poor?

It may be answered that the balance remains to the credit of members and will eventually go for charity. This is not the fact. The same kind of transactions have now continued for sixty-four years, as the reports of the order show—that is, it has continued since the foundation of the order in this country, the proof of which statement we now proceed to give.

Before us lies the "Proceedings of the Fifty-eighth Annual Communication of the Sovereign Grand Lodge of the I. O. O. F.", Sept. 1882, from which we learn that the total receipts of all jurisdictions during the previous year were, $4,397,720.22, and the total relief $1,652,148.18. Here again the receipts were nearly two and three-fourths times as much as the "relief." Surely there is no charity in such figures. They ought to consign an insurance company to contempt for exorbitant rates of insurance.

On page 88–93 of the same document cited above are given a summary of statistics for the past fifty-one years, from which it appears that the order has collected $87,574,260.03, and paid for relief $32,777,-554.34. Here again we have the same disproportionate amount of relief and receipts. A committee of the Sovereign Grand Lodge, whose business it was to make recommendation on the subject state that the minimum expenses of the local lodge will require $2.-50 out of every $8. This is declared to be the most "liberal allowance of benefits possible," while in fact the benefits are usually about one-third or one-fifth the total receipts.

The only thing that gives popularity to the order is the calling of this work "charity" and thus precluding that close public scrutiny which shrewd business men would give it if regarded in the light of a business transaction. There can be no doubt that the order is imposing on the unwary. They are collecting immense sums of money from laboring men and giving no adequate compensation. Let this fact be generally known and initiations will soon cease.

Let those who have followed these figures notice one more fact showing that thousands have been disappointed when the facts here given became apparent to them. Since 1830 there have been initiated into the order 1,224,869 persons. The number of members deceased in that time is 96,119, and the present membership is 489,363. Adding these two items together we have 585,482. Subtracting this from the number initiated we have left 639,387 members who have abandoned the order in the past fifty-one years. They went in, paid their initiation fee, paid their annual dues for a season and then withdrew. Why? Surely, if they had found everything lovely, and had derived constant benefits from the order they would not have abandoned it in such numbers. Here are 639,387 witnesses against the order—more by far than the present entire membership.

REFORM NEWS.

THROUGH IOWA.

MARYVILLE, MO., May 2, 1883.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I left home April 16th and in the evening reached Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where I found a most kind reception in the family of Bro. N. Bourne, publisher of the Iowa Auerican. I then visited Marion, Marshalltown, Albion, and Hiekory Grove, where I spent the Sabbath, listening to an exeellent sermon from Rev. H. S. Atchison, and preaching in the afternoon in the Hall of the Miner's Institute at Avery. At each ot these places I found the friends of our reform in good heart, and deeply interested in our reform work in Washington, D. C.

There seemed to be a general desire that the next State Convention for Iowa be held at Albia, in Monroe county, because it is central, accessible, and in the immediate vicinity of much sympathy with our reform. There are in and near Albia two United Presbyterian churches, one Reformed Presbyterian, and one Associate Presbyterian. A reeent heavy bank failure has brought financial trouble to many, any it is believed that Masonry had much to do with it.

At midnight of the 23d I left Albia for Clarinda, Iowa, taking breakfast in the morning with our exeellent brother Whittaker, who took me to the home of Mr. David McKee, of the Covenanter church, where I was most kindly entertained. Bro. McKee and his large congregation illustrate the soundness of their faith by the excellency of their works. In studying the Epistle to the Romans, they have not forgotten the Epistle of James.

From thence I went to College Springs, where I spent several days with the many tried and earnest friends of our reform. College Springs abounds with ministers who are nearly all noted for faithfulness in ripening the unfruitful works of darkness. Bro. Johnston, Avery and Hall need no introduction to the readers of the Cynosure. I met here Father Leuty, who has done so much to aid our reform. He is still vigorous for one of his years, and abates not one jot of interest in the work. He has purchased property there, and expects to make it his home. There, too, is Prof. Dodd, who fills a chair in the College, and worthily represents Wheaton and its principles.

On Sabbath, the 29th, I preached in the morning in the Congregational church, and in the evening attended union service in the United Presbyterian church. Monday evening, 30th, I addressed the College Springs Christian Association on the relations of the secret orders to civil government, in the United Presbyterian church. The night was dark and rainy but the attendance was respectable, and the collection taken up for the Washington work was $13.13.

On Tuesday night, May 1st, I spoke in "The Brethren Church," in Shambaugh. Again it was dark with heavy rain, but we had a good meeting. I stayed with Bro. and Sister R. S. Woodmanse, who brought me to the ears, and at 2:30 P. M. I reached this place. The net results of my collections to date, are, for Washington work: Pledges, $37; Notes, $35; cash collected, $80.50; total, $162.63. I expect to be at Nebraska State meeting.

AN INCIDENT.

MARYVILLE, Mo., May 3.—To-day the Knight Templars paraded in Maryville. They numbered just eighteen, but were grandly adorned. They met in the Episcopal church, and the pastor read the usual service. About thirty ladies and three or four men were present as spectators. I distributed tracts through the crowd, and left some in the seats, which the minister discovered and had them removed, but I got them again and gave them all out. Poor man! Something so shocked him that before he had finished his service he fell in a fainting fit and the services closed abruptly. Whether it was the tracts, or the clatter of the swords when the Knights kneeled, or the fact that the poor fellows were so little used to praying that they forgot to take off their hats in prayer time, I do not know, but hope that when he revived he was ashamed of his company and his folly.

H. H. HINMAN.

"JERICHO STRAITLY SHUT UP."

SABETHA, Kansas.

On the evening of my third lecture in Opera Hall in this city, and as I was about to begin, a Mason loudly informed me that the lodge "has made fifty-two new members since you have begun these lectures." I replied that, if so, the lodge was making money, and should be willing to give the active Anti-masons twenty-five dollars apiece to help the cause and act as a counter-irritant to keep alive the "image of the beast."

When I closed, the audience called on the above Mason for a speech. He arose and said, "This is an anti-secret meeting and I don't know as I ought to make a speech here. We think if we let it [the anti-secret movement] alone, it will die of itself. I guess I'll not say anything. We hope that if we let it alone it will die of itself. I guess I'll not say anything more."

Thus we were favored with two speeches on the same evening from an adhering Mason. Placed in antithesis they appear somewhat paradoxical. To learn from the first that the anti-secret lectures are the means of recruiting the Masonic ranks, and from the second that the Masons here are in hopes that this admirable and eminently successful means of recruiting the same (?) "will die of itself," might perplex those unacquainted with the chameleonic nature of Masonry. But men who have worn the hoodwink and cable-tow need not be told that the first speech was bluster and that the second was the true exposition of the attitude of the fraternity here toward the reform.

A few days after, I met a Mason and hailed him with the old question, "Are you a Mason?" He replied, "I am."

"What makes you a Mason?" He replied, "I am not at liberty to converse with you, until I know whether you are an Anti-mason or not."

I then named the gentleman who made the above speech, and informed my reticent friend that he was not possessed of the "instructive tongue," as the above Masonic speaker had. Whereupon he turned with a savage growl and asked, "Did N. S. Smith make a speech up there the other night?" I informed him that he made two of them.

This proved too much and he left in a rage. All this shows me that the statements made to me by adhering Masons are to be relied on, ——— that "Now Jericho" is "straitly shut up," by order of the Worshipful Master. That its walls are likely to fall may be seen from the following:

We have a number of young men here who ride bicycles through the main street of the city, who, when passing each other, make the "due guard and sign of an Entered Apprentice," and often upset in order to make the "grand hailing sign of distress" of a Master Mason.

One of the most intelligent farmers in this county, while at the post office, was accused of being a Mason by a friend of mine, upon which he turned and gave him a look of contempt, and proceeded at once with an Anti-masonic lecture, on the inability of citizens of these United States to obtain justice in the courts of law. He pointed to the fact that the Masons control the country, hold all the offices, and dictate in the affairs of the church as well. He then illustrated his first assertion by the case which I have mentioned in a former letter, and then recited another case still more aggravating which occurred right here, in which a poor widow was robbed of her property by a Mason, through Masonic rascals, who are running our entire judiciary. We urged him to unite with us and subscribe for the Cynosure. But he refused to do either, and said, "No I cannot go further now. Go on, you are on the right track. Wake them up; but mark my words, they'll kill you." He could repeat the penalties in orthodox style. But fear of consequences keeps him, as it does many others, from espousing the cause of reform.

We are all greatly interested in the reform news. "Truth before favor." GEO. T. DISSETTE.

FROM SOUTH-WEST MISSOURI.

RITCHEY, Mo., Apr. 26, 1883.

EDITORS CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—Our Anti-secret club meets at Freedom School-house, Newton county, Mo., Saturday night before the full moon in each month. At our last meeting we had the pleasure of having Bro. Glassford of Carthage, Mo., with us. Bro. Glassford is a man whom the anti-secret party may well be proud of. He opposes Masonry because he thinks it to be a Christ-excluding, soul damning system. He lectured Saturday night on Masonry, and on the Sabbath preached to the people from Ephesians 3: 20, 21: "Now unto him that is able to do exceeding abundantly above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us: unto him be glory in the church by Christ Jesus, throughout all ages, world without end, amen." When he was telling the people what Christ was able to do for them, what a near and dear friend he was, able to save his people from all sin, the sin of lodgery was not excepted.

I want to ask the readers of the Cynosure to pray for Bro. Glassford that he may be able in the future as in the past to oppose the devil's church (the lodge). He is talking of getting S. E. Starry to come and help him work the degrees, and says he will pay Bro. Starry himself. Masonry in south-west Missouri is dying, slowly but certainly. It dies hard, but no one would expect such a powerful beast to die without a fearful struggle.

NOTES FROM THE MICHIGAN MEETING.

CHICAGO, April 27, 1883.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—As it pleased God to enable me to attend the late Michigan State Convention, held at Grand Rapids, I cheerfully give my testimony as to the progress of the work in that quarter.

The interest, and representation of zealous men and women in attendance at the convention exceeded my expectations. Nor was zeal the only characteristic; here were to be seen delegates from various portions of the State, whose knowledge of, and skill in handling practical truth would have been a credit to any age.

Not least among the things of interest was the apparent general dissatisfaction with the past, and even with the present progress of the reform work. Much as this State has done in proportion to many others, the workers are quite impatient, and determined that the cause must advance at all hazards. New, as is much of the State, and poor as are many of the reformers—because they are reformers—there seems to be a call, that increased and tremendous efforts be made to banish the darkness, and to raise on high the banner of the Cross. Here, as elsewhere, there seems to be unusual encouragement to work, on account of the increased attention given by many to the fact that perchance in this may be found the cause largely, for the growing immorality and darkness all over this and other lands. The friends of the cause are many, and increasing; there are ample resources in the State, though scattered; there are workers in comparative abundance, if they could be even moderately supported. It was to devise means to gather up these resources, or rather to consider a plan already proposed, (that of the Alliance) that occupied considerable of the time and attention at this meeting. Whether or not the plan proposed in Michigan is a success, it will certainly stir the minds of the people, and thereby something will be done. We need, and must have, in every State, a solid corporate body—a charter, a corps of officers and Board of directors—a something in which people will have confidence, and on which they can more confidently rely that their means and contributions will be wisely and economically applied. The number of those who are daily coming out from the ungodly, apostatizing churches, is hourly increasing; the means which the Lord has given them they not only are willing, but desire to give for religious work. Many of these, however, would be induced to do more, and would do it more freely, for work done in their own State, or where they could enjoy, somewhat, seeing the results. A corporate body, besides, would be capable of utilizing bequests, some of which might not be immediately available, but which would in time, or by direct management be quite as useful and helpful. In fact, as we think over this question, the conviction grows that perhaps our cause has been retarded rather from a neglect to systematize, than from the indifference or apathy of Christian people.

In conclusion, then, I wish to say that I myself am almost surprised at the impetus I acquired by attending that convention. The impressions there made while assembled with that company of devout believers, I shall ever regard as among the happiest experiences of my life.

CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTERS FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

GOOD MEN AND MINISTERS.

Conversing with a lady whom I chanced to meet in my travels I casually remarked, "I am opposed to all secret societies;" to which she promptly replied, "I am in favor of them."

I said, "why do you approve them?"

"Because," she replied, "they have done so much good."

I asked again, "Do you mean the Invincibles of Ireland, the Black Hand of Spain, the Ku-Klux and Molly Maguires of our own country?"

"Oh no!" she exclaimed, "I mean the Masons and Odd-fellows."

I said "What good have they done?" She seemed a little at a loss to say just what, but replied, "They must be good, because so many good men and ministers belong to them."

This seemed to embrace about all the knowledge she had of them, and when I began to unfold to her some of the mysteries of the "occult science" it was evident that new visions had dawned upon her mind.

There are multitudes of otherwise intelligent persons of whom this woman is a sample. Pinning their faith upon the good men and minister "dodge" they follow as implicitly as the most ignorant and devout Catholic receives the "dictum" of his priest.

Now if such persons would take the trouble to investigate they would find that:

1. Secret societies are one and indivisible in fundamental principles. So absolute is this identity that an attack upon one of them is considered as opposition to all. Some will agree with you in condemning certain acts of the "Ku-Klux," "Mollies," etc., and agree that these acts are a perversion of a legitimate agency from its proper use. They are at bottom one and indivisible, our enemies themselves being judges.

2. They all seek to obtain unequal advantages over persons who do not belong, and who are often more needy and deserving than the members themselves. Each one is a "plot" in which a secret few conspire to obtain selfish and in a vast majority of cases, unlawful end, ends to which they are not entitled either as citizens under the law or as members in the commonwealth of the Redeemed; being conspiracies outside the legitimate action of justifiable means to a worthy end, they all adopt the rogues method to conceal their true purpose.

3. They could not fail to note the interference of all these orders with the domestic and social relations in every family or community not like the "Bender family," so noted for their butcheries a few years ago in Kansas, or a community of pirates and thieves who "hate the light because their deeds are evil." God's order for the husband and wife is, they shall be no more two but one flesh. Civilization is built upon this basis, and not upon Mormon "plurality" or lodge discrimination, and when the "bottom is knocked out" by the Endowment House lodge, or the clan oath of secrecy, the superstructure goes down. The wife becomes an "attachment" to and not a joint member in the household. When the lodge comes in at the front door with its regal titles and guady trappings, the plain honest wife must retire to the kitchen or pass to the menial duties of a secondary, as much as when wife number two supplants the rightful mistress of her house.

4. The humiliation of the wife and mother below the vain and pompous "swells" of the brotherhood, leads the van of evils that come in troops to destroy the integrity of home. Necessity, "the mother of invention," compels the man to take refuge in the "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain" to conceal the prohibited things of his order, and the once frank, ingenuous father becomes an adept in the art of deception, and by his pernicious example leads the lambs of his flock on towards irretrievable ruin. At first his heart recoils and he loathes the poisoned cup. Loosing fortitude to resist, like the inebriate he yields to the pressure upon his conscience and his high resolve, until the draft becomes endurable, and the endurable a pastime, and a fixed habit, and the man lives a very personification of lodge hypocrisy before his uninitiated children who are looking to him for an example. Perchance he tells them to be good and true, and to honor their mother, but they see him giving the lie to his teachings in his constant practice of deception.

5. Investigation showed them to be financial frauds and that the oath which makes the Mason, disqualifies the man for membership in the visible church of Christ and renders him totally unfit to hold any office or exercise any important trust in civil society. Christ does not share either the hearts or the worship of his disciples with another; and equality of rights before the law is fundamental to our civil compact. Masonry permits neither of these, and makes positive war on them both. Excluding Christ from its worship, it swears its members to partiality and thus by its own acts places itself outside the pale of Christianity and civil society among organizations for piracy plunder and crimes of every grade.

6. When the bottom facts in the temperance work are reached it will appear that secret societies dam up the currents of prohibition and foster both the appetite for liquor and promote its sale. This has been tested and demonstrated in Kansas and Iowa. Driven to the "last ditch" by the popular vote the whiskey interest was forced to the "forlorn hope" of the lodge. This insiduous system of blood fled to the embrace of its doting mother for shelter and there succeeded in baffling its pursuers. But its a poor relief. The honest temperance people are on the track. They are following the brute to his hole, and they will hunt him from his lair, strangle his cubs and impail the hideous monster upon an intelligent public sentiment and trample his oaths in the dust under the onward march of prohibition to its destined universal supremacy. May God hasten the day when the twin curses of the nations shall be overthrown.

INTIMIDATION.

In order to show the extent of fear to which writers are subjected by the lodge, no better fact can be adduced than an article in a recent number of the North American Review on communism in the United States. It would seem almost impossible that a candid, sincere person could write on this subject without alluding to secret societies, since it is from those societies that communism springs; but it has been done by a writer in the Review alluded to.

He indeed speaks of Grangerism, a species of secret association, and of Shaking-quakers, Perfectionists, and other societies of little note or consequence; but of the great communistic bodies of Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship he says nothing. Of the two great levelling secret associations, which are closely allied with Kukluxry and Mormonism, he remains silent. He sees no evil in them! Against a class of men who are teaching the most pernicious doctrines, calculated to subvert Christian society, he makes no charge or comment. Such is the fearful despotism which Freemasonry exercises over the American press.

AMERICAN.

A DEFENDER OF ODD-FELLOW FAITH.

CLEARPORT, OHIO. April 16th, 1883.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—A lecture on Odd-fellowship was given in the Reformed church at this point, Friday evening, April 13th. The lecturer, Rev. Scott F. Herschey, is a minister of the Reformed church residing at Lancaster, Ohio, and is a young man of good address and fine oratorical powers. Notwithstanding that their is a thickly settled community and the weather was remarkably fine, there was not more than twehty-five or thirty persons present, which certainly was not very encouraging to the speaker. The discourse, although quite a model of oratorical excellence, was simply the customary eulogy of the order, without any attempt being made to answer the arguments that have been advanced against it. As is usual with the advocates of secrecy, the lecture abounded in misrepresentations, and the speaker made several attempts at downright deception. I will mention only one.

He stated that it was true that the Odd-fellows grips, signs, passwords, etc., were known outside of the order, but that, although a man might be well versed in these, he could not work his way into a lodge by means of them if he was not an Odd-fellow; and he gave this as a proof that there was some grand, magical power peculiar to Odd-fellowship lying back of these signs and grips which enabled them to recognize each other.

Now the noted lecturer doubtless thought that he was talking to a crowd of moss-backs who would swallow anything he put at them. The reason why an outsider, knowing the permanent grips, signs, etc., cannot work his way into a lodge is simply because each lodge is continually changing its password so that it is impossible for an outsider to know the present password, especially if he is a stranger in the place. And if he is known to the members of the lodge of course he will not be admitted.

A rather amusing incident occurred of which I must speak, which goes to show the feeling entertained by members of the lodge toward the N. C. A. In the village store, a little while before the lecture I handed the book entitled, "Odd-fellowship judged by its own utterance," to a gentleman for examination. Another gentleman, who is a great admirer of Mr. Herschey, and consequently of Odd-fellowship, stepping up at the moment, requested to see the book. After the audience had assembled this individual informed the lecturer that some one was circulating books in opposition to the order; and the speaker took the stand, evidently under the impression that he was in the midst of great opposition. In the course of his remarks, he said, I happen to know that there is a one-horse house in Chicago sending out books for the purpose of tearing down our order, and some of the most unprinciplee men are engaged in it." He then proceeded to inform the audience that there was not one word of truth in those books, in tones that did not display any "friendship" or "love" for them or the publisher. The truth is, Bro. Herschey and every secret society man in the United States has good cause to fear and hate that "one-horse house in Chicago." They are well aware of the mighty work it is accomplishing toward educating the youth of the country against the dark empire, and thereby undermining the very foundation of their orders. C. M. S.

TEWKSBURY.

The family that has had the management of the Tewksbury Alms House seem to have operated precisely on lodge principles. Just as they have colluded to make the Alms House serve their own personal interests, sometimes in a most ghastly way; so the lodge colludes to make the most of public affairs for the benefit of its members. Though General Butler is a bright Mason of the 32nd and 33rd degree, yet he is so accustomed to the hoodwink that he does not appear to see the perfect parallel between the Marsh family in its relation to the Alms House and the Masonic family in its relation to the public service. This seemingly innocent unconsciousness of the General with respect to matters that reflect on himself, is one of the most prominent traits of his character. He does not seem to be in the least aware that a position at the head of the Masonic fraternity is far more discreditable, and an infinitely greater injury to the country, than the position of head of the Marsh fraternity.

The man who expects to reform the political condition in which the country has been left by the "services" of such men as the General, must not vote for a Freemason, any more than he would for one of the Marsh family.

SO MOTE IT BE!

NOTES.

"Herod the king." Herod Agrippa I., the "Herod the king" of this chapter, was grandson of Herod the Great (the Herod of Matt. 2), son of Aristobulus, nephew of Herod Antipas (the murderer of the Baptist), brother of Herodias, and father of Herod Agrippa II. (the Agrippa of Acts 25), and of Berniee and Drusilla. Agrippa (as the Herod of this chapter is called by Josephus) was an intimate friend of the Emperor Caligula, who gave him the province of Trachonitis and Abilene (Luke 3:1), with the title of king, and subsequently also Galilee and Peræa. The next emperor, Claudius, added to his kingdom Judea and Samaria.—Eugene Stock. He was very luxurious, and at the same time a strict observer of the ritual of the Jews. At no little personal risk he prevailed on Caligula not to insist on his statue being placed in the temple. A profession of bigotry and a love of popularity combined to make him a persecutor.—Cook.

"James the brother of John." James the elder, the son of Zebedee. He is to be distinguished from James the younger, the kinsman of our Lord (Gal. 1:19), who is the individual meant under this name in the remainder of the history (Hackett), and who was bishop of Jerusalem and writer of the epistle of James. After 11 (14, A. D. 30–44) years of patient, noble work, the brother of John received one portion of the high reward which Salome had asked for her sons (Matt. 20:21). He was the first of the Twelve to drink of the cup of which Christ drank, and to be baptized with the baptism with which he was baptized.—Schaff. Why was James selected?—(1) He had been among the three specially favored disciples of Jesus. It is therefore likely that he would take a leading part in the labors of the Church, and so Agrippa's attention would be drawn to him as a proper person to be first struck down. (2) All the accusations which had been laid against Stephen, that the Christian leader spake against the temple and the law, would be used with effect to such a zealous observer of Mosaic ritual as Herod Agrippa was. (3) The name of these chosen brothers, "Sons of Thunder," gives us the clue to the reason of the Master's choice. This singular name bears witness to the burning and impetuous spirit with which James in bold, vigorous words, so often during his ministry to the churches of the Holy Land, had caused the thunder of the divine displeasure against hypocrisy, formalism, and darker sins than these, to be heard. His burning words, backed up by the noble testimony of a saintly life, no doubt won him the proud honor among the Twelve of the first martyr crown.—Schaff.

"Because he saw it pleased the Jews." Herod was very ambitious, but his power depended mostly on the favor of others. So long as he pleased the Roman emperor, and also the people in his own dominion, he would be likely to retain his power. Besides, almost all love to be popular with those among whom they live. Then the income of his kingdom, according to Josephus, was 12,000,000 drachmas, or $2,000,000 a year, which he would keep by pleasing the Jews.—Peloubet.

"Prayer was made without ceasing." Real prayer is a real power in the unseen world. Absolutely the only force exerted for the apostle's deliverance was the effort manifested in the prayer-meeting in the house of Mary the mother of Mark. With childlike trust they reposed in the profoundest reality in the world to them, the personal friendship of God. Could Herod have seen those saints upon their knees, he might have exclaimed, as did Ethelred, the Saxon king, when he saw the monks of Bangor praying against him for the success of their countrymen: "They have begun the fight against me. Attack them first."—Prof. Churchill. Did they not move heaven and earth for his deliverance? They sought to move heaven, and left it to heaven to move the earth.—Kitto. They tell us of the fixed laws of nature! but who dares maintain that he who fixed these laws cannot use them for the purpose of answering his people's prayers?—Taylor.

"Peter was sleeping." That sleep was the triumph of faith. Peter's sleep in the prison that night was as much glory to God as his wakefulness would have been, although he had sung psalms till the rafters rang again. Peter slept in Gethsemane. with the two brothers, on the night of the Master's supreme agony. Then he slept through weakness of the flesh; now and here he sleeps through the strength of his faith.—Arnot.

"Bind on thy sandals." The angel gives these various directions: (1) to indicate the reality of the appearance; (2) to show there was no need of haste. "Tarry not to bind on your sandals," was a usual saying among the Greeks when they urged one to hasten.—Schaff.

"Came to hearken." A curious account of Eastern custom, respecting knocking at the door, is given by Prof. Porter in his notes to Kitto, p. 250. He says the door is never opened without the question "Who?" being first put and answered; and if the person inside goes to report the answer, the visitor continues knocking. More than once, when he himself returned home after a journey, his own servant "opened not the gate for gladness," but left him standing outside to run in and tell the news of his arrival.—Stock.

"It is his angel." No other rendering but his angel will suit the sense; and with a few exceptions all commentators, ancient and modern, have recognized this meaning. Our Lord plainly asserts the doctrine of guardian angels in Matt. 18:10; and from this we further learn in what sense his words were understood by the early Church. From his words, "Despise not one of these little ones, for their angels do always behold the face of my Father which is in heaven," we infer that each one has his guardian angel.—Alford. The Jews believed that each individual had his own special guardian angel, who sometimes assumed the appearance and the voice of the person himself. See Lightfoot on this passage.—Abbott. This belief in guardian angels was common to the Greeks and Romans. Every scholar will recall the famous instance of Socrates.—Gloag.

"They were astonished." This does not indicate, as some have inferred, that these praying disciples "had small expectations of an answer." On the contrary, where could we look for the true prayer of faith, if not in this week of unceasing prayer by the whole Church? They were astonished not at the FACT of an answer, but at the strange way in which it came. (1) Their unceasing earnestness was a proof of faith. (2) It was impossible for them to know what answer was wisest and best. God had allowed Stephen to be stoned, and his martyrdom had spread the Gospel as a great wind spreads a conflagration. How did they know it was not God's will for Peter also to be a martyr that should light up the heathen skies with the Gospel, even more than his life could have done? (3) They prayed for Peter because they loved him, and because he seemed necessary for the good of Christ's cause; but the soul of their prayer was for the cause of Christ and the salvation of men. (4) They knew this prayer would be answered. Even if Peter was to be released, they could not imagine in which, of a hundred possible ways, it would be done. They never dreamed of the plan God actually used. No wonder they were astonished. Our prayers are oftenest answered in unexpected ways. Our astonishment at the way and the time does not deny our expectation of an answer.—Peloubet.

PROMPTINGS TO FURTHER STUDY.

What was the relation of the Herod of this lesson to Herod that killed John the Baptist? What was his relation to the Herod who endeavored to murder the infant Jesus? What days were the days of unleavened bread? What leaven did Jesus warn his disciples to avoid? What leaven did Paul urge his hearers to put away? How many instances of the imprisonment of an apostle are recorded in the book of the Acts?—Scholars' Quarterly.

BAND OF HOPE BIBLE LESSON.—V.

ANCIENT BAAL WORSHIP.

1. To truly keep the first commandment ensures the keeping of all the others.

2. The Jews served Baal before Jehovah.

3. We read of their serving Moloch, Chemosh, etc., but these were only different names given by different nations to the same idol.

4. Baal was worshipped under various forms and names, and with different rites, but the same essential principle is found under all,—so that to serve Baal is used in the Old Testament as a general term for every false religion of that day.

5. The false worships of the present day, however they may seem to differ, are essentially alike. They have all this one grand feature in common,—they reject Christ.

6. The altars of Baal were erected on hills natural or artificial, sometimes on the roofs of houses.

7. They were also built in groves, sometimes under a single spreading tree.

8. Abraham, we are told, built a grove in which to worship the true God.

8. The Jews were forbidden to use groves and high places because associated with the dark and impure rites of idolatry. A thing may not be wrong in itself and yet become wrong by evil associations.

10. The worshippers of Baal probably erected their altars in groves so as to throw a greater mystery around their rites. False religion always courts concealment.

11. Baal worship was very cruel. Human victims were frequently offered to him.

12. It extended over all the known heathen world and was once general throughout the British Islands and northern Europe.

13. It is also known at the present day. Freemasonry is a form of Baal or sun worship, and many customs in this and other Christian lands owe their origin to these heathen ceremonies.

14. Even the priests left their temple duties to serve Baal, or tried to unite his worship with that of the true God.

15. Baal worship is worse now than it was then, for we have the light of the Gospel.

16. Egypt is to-day "the basest of the kingdoms." Babylon is a heap of ruins. The Jews have no national existence but are scattered through the world, and their holy city ruled by foreigners.

17. The Bible tells us plainly that all idolators shall be destroyed.

PRACTICAL TRUTHS.

If we keep the first commandment we shall keep the others.

We break this commandment when we do not love God more that anything else.

All false worships are essentially the same.

No idolater can have eternal life.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Have no other Gods before me. Ex. 20: 3.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—We should love God supremely.

QUESTIONS.

What is the subject of this lesson? Repeat the Golden Text. Central Truth.

1. Why is this the first commandment?
2. Did the Jews keep it? 2 Kings 17: 16, l. c.
3. Did they serve other gods besides Baal? 1 Kings 11: 5, 7, 35. Amos 5: 26.
4. Why are these alluded to as if distinct deities when they mean the same?
5. Are the false worships of the present day essentially alike?
6. Where were the altars of Baal erected? Num. 22: 41.
7. Where else were th y erected? Judges 6: 25, 28; 2 Kings 21: 3; Ez. 6: 13.
8. Was it common in very early times to worship God in groves? Gen. 21: 23.
9. Why were not the Jews allowed to do so? Deut. 16: 21.
10. Can you think of any reason why Baal was worshipped in groves?
11. What terrible fact do we learn from Jeremiah 19: 5?
12. How far did Baal worship extend?
13. Is it known at the present day?
14. How general was it among the Jews? Jer. 2: 8; 23: 13.
15. Was Baal worship worse then than it is to-day?
16. What became of the ancient nations that served Baal? Isaiah 13: 19; Ez. 29: 13; Jer. 9: 11.
17. What are we told about idolaters? Rev. 21: 8.
18. Name the practical truths taught in this lesson.

LESSON NOTES.

Baal had different names among different nations. He was called Moloch by the Phænicians, Bel by the Babylonians and Beel by the early British. There is a locality in London which is even now called Belinsgate, and in many parts of England, Ireland and Scotland are still standing the cromlechs or huge stone altars erected many hundreds of years ago to this dark and cruel deity.

The custom of keeping Easter and Christmas originated in ancient paganism. Christmas was the old Saturnalia; a time given up to debauchery and revelling in honor of Saturn who is thought by many to be the same as Baal. Easter was so named from the Saxon goddess Oistre whose festival was celebrated in the spring with many ceremonies akin to sun worship.

Freemasonry is claimed by its own writers to have its origin in ancient Baal or sun worship. Mackey says, "their identity is obvious from the striking coincidences found to exist between them."

A STRANGE OMISSION.—Near the ancient city of Cæserea of Palestine there is a river called Terka, in which crocodiles are found. It has been suggested that they were originally brought from Egypt by immigrants from that country, for the purpose of being worshiped as gods. But why have not Dr. Rob Morris and Ben Perley Poore mentioned this striking evidence that Freemasonry must have been introduced into the holy land from Egypt a great many ages ago? Is it not evident that the tears of the crocodile are symbolical of the pious contributions made by the fraternity for poor widows and orphans?

ALAS MY BROTHER!

Those men who have been most effective laborers in the Master's vineyard, and the most useful members of the church of Christ, have been the most close and careful students of the Bible. They have been men of one book; some of them have hardly known another; they having been debarred from the general range of literature. They have studied God's Word and their own hearts.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, MAY 10, 1883.

ATTENTION

is called to the articles discussing Odd-fellowship in the present number of the Cynosure. It has been suggested that in many places this order is pushing itself into greater prominence than Freemasonry, and that more should be said upon its principles and methods. Able articles on this order have appeared from time to time, especially since February 1st, but we are able to promise a few more which will be printed without delay.

A GREAT NUMBER OF THE CYNOSURE

may be confidently expected next week. We can assure every reader that they cannot afford to miss it, and it should be worth a thousand names to our list. It will contain with other things a fine portrait of Senator Pomeroy with a sketch of his wonderful public life.

EDITORIAL LETTERS.

WASHINGTON NOTES.

ON EMANCIPATION DAY, April 16th, the colored people of this District turned out in the ridiculous regalia of their fifty-one secret "orders," in long array. Is it not a marvel that Hon. Frederick Douglass, and ex-Senator Bruce, both of them popular leaders, have never joined secret societies?

DR. SUNDERLAND of the First Presbyterian church of this city was pastor of the Presbyterian church in Batavia, N. Y., Judge Moses Taggart's pastor, who spoke at the unveiling of the Morgan monument; and Mrs. Taggart lately wrote Dr. Sunderland on the death of her husband. Is it not astounding that Dr. Sunderland should now be a Knight Templar! and dangle the jewel of that unutterably abominable "order" at his vest! When Aaron "the saint of the Lord," was rebuked by Moses for his idolatrous worship, he excused himself that he was dragged into it by the madness of the multitude: "Thou knowest the people that they are set on mischief." But Aaron came out!

THE ARK OF GOD, which represented the only worship on our globe, which took men to God by Christ, was taken by the Philistines and set in the temple of Dagon by their idol. God, however, did not accept their mixed worship, but smote them. The Philistines then sent the ark back to the Israelites, drawn by two young cows, whose calves they tied at home. The honest cows took the ark back, but the stupid Bethshemites sacrificed the cows. Precisely so the Union men, all through the South, are to-day being sacrificed by the Republican party! The poor honest creatures helped bring our Union back; and they are now sacrificed, slain and starving, while the departments here are filled with Masons and ex-rebels! See 1 Samuel, chapter 6.

THE GREAT IRISH CONVENTION.

On Thursday, April 26, 1883, one thousand one hundred and fifty-five delegates; "Irish and of Irish descent," met in Philadelphia and formed the Irish National League of America, to aid in achieving self-government for Ireland.

It was called to order by Alexander Sullivan, designated as "a brilliant young lawyer of Chicago," who is now president of the league. The call was read by a priest, Father Betts. The temporary chairman was a priest, Father Dorney of Chicago, who was conducted to the chair by two priests and a layman. The permanent chairman was Hon. M. A. Foran, Member of Congress from Ohio. The chairman of the committee on resolutions was a priest, Father O'Reilly, and the "rules" adopted were as stringent as those of an English court to try Irishmen, viz., no delegate to speak over five minutes, but by unanimous consent; or more than once till all who wished had spoken and in no case but twice. All resolutions to be handed unread to the secretary, and by him handed to a committee, and all the voting to be done by chairmen of each constituency. With such rules the chairman sat upon a boiler with the steam valve chained down; and it required all this, and all the Irish reverence for, and habitual obedience to priests to prevent an explosion. As it was, Mr. Powers of Chicago, pointing to priest O'Reilly, said: "That man has no right to be here." "We will not be gagged." And "several angry protests arose at once." "Congressman Finerty of Chicago" was specially recalcitrant.

"THE TERRIBLE ARRAIGNMENT."

This was adopted on Friday, April 27th; and, for splendor of diction, sweep of historic learning, and bitter, burning, blistering invective, it out-O'Connell's O'Connell himself; and that is as far as humanity can go.

It sets out with the sound assumption that government exists to protect the "life," "liberty," "property" and "peace" of mankind. And it proceeds to show that England has for seven whole centuries governed Ireland, "Not to preserve the lives of the governed but to destroy them;" "has not defended the liberty of the people, but annihilated it;" "instead of protecting the property of the people, has been a conspiracy for its injury and ruin;" "has not maintained peace and order, but broken her peace and destroyed her order;" and, instead of allowing the Irish an equitable voice in legislation; while, in England, one man in twelve votes for members of Parliament, in Ireland one in twenty-five votes.

The above are the five dry propositions or counts in an indictment of England, the filling up of which no man, having human feelings, can read, even if he believed it false or exaggerated, without finding his heart heave with unutterable emotions. But this horrible indictment is in large part, true. The wrongs of Ireland are not fancies, but facts. Ever since the then reigning Pope of Rome gave Ireland, bodily, to the sixth English Henry, it has been, in the words of O'Connell, "The saddest country the sun ever saw." Why, the very estates whose landlords have been murdered by the Irish till murder has become their pastime, were originally, in part, wrung from their Irish owners, by English laws, which permitted children to seize the property of their Catholic parents by changing their religion and turning Protestant. A calm Englishman in 1843, told me that he himself had seen an Irish woman, who carried sour buttermilk in a kettle eight miles, to sell in market, to raise money to pay church rates to an English Episcopal rector, who preached a religion which she did not believe! And even Ulster, staid Presbyterian Ulster, has, for I know not how long, had its clergy paid in part by a Regium donum or royal hush-money, wrung by British harpies from the Irish soil! Thus sanctifying robbery, in the name of Protestantism, by the Gospel of the Son of God!

Our own horrible civil war, and the part an English Tory government took in it, are too recent for us to forget; and the flag of England protected Mason and Slidell, who were worse, because more capable, traitors and murderers than Rossa and Most. And we well know that, by her cotton loan and diplomacy; England, that is to say, the then English administration, did its utmost to sustain the "Confederacy" and "Empire;" to extinguish the world's last and only hope of popular government; and in the face of her own emancipation, wrung out of her by her philanthropists, to eternize "American slavery, the vilest that ever saw the sun." —In spite of feeble health Bro. Hinman is pushing on, and expects to meet the Nebraska brethren this week in their State Convention. His letter elsewhere will not be overlooked.

—Acknowledgements for Washington fund will appear next week.

—The New England American for May is entirely devoted to Odd-fellowship, discussing the various characteristics of the order from the claims it sets forth to the world, and the initiation ceremony to its exclusion of Jesus Christ. This forms a powerful document, and a large extra edition has been printed for circulation in New England.

—The Christian World, the western organ of the German Reformed church, is another paper to be entered on the list of those outspoken against lodgery. Though not committed to the discussion of the secret orders, it lately published an emphatic testimony against them.

—A Masonic lodge, to be conducted on temperance principles, is about to be founded in Manchester, England. This is about like running a pool table or a billiard room on temperance principles.

—The Christian Worker, the western organ of the Friends, has just removed from New Vienna, Ohio, where it has prospered for a dozen years, to this city. Friend Hill, the former proprietor, has transferred his interests to a publishing company, and Calvin W. Pritchard has been selected as editor. The first number under the new regime is a handsome sheet, and promises to be of great assistance in permeating society in general with many of the excellent principles of the Quakers.

—Bro. Hinman, who has been visiting Elder Rufus Smith at Maryville, Mo., sends the good word that Bro. Smith agrees to be one of forty to pay $2,000 to the Washington fund by October 1st next. This is a good offer. Who next will subscribe to it?

—Rev. A. J. Quint, D. D., secretary and actuary of the National Congregational Council, now living in Dover, New Hampshire, announces himself as candidate for speaker of the New Hampshire House of Representatives. His having taken thirty-two degrees of Masonic blasphemy and bearing the exalted title Sublime Prince of the Royal Secret, is a heavy recommendation for him.

—An old friend, the reform singer, Geo. W. Clark, is now living in Rochester, N. Y. He lately sang at a temperance service at the Frank St. Methodist church of that city, and was enthusiastically applauded. None who have heard him sing should fail to have a copy or two of his "Reform Song Book," for sale at this office. Price, 40 cents.

—Bro. J. F. Browne, of Germantown, Ky., sends the following acknowledgement:

"I wish, through the columns of the Cynosure, to express my thanks to God and Bro. D. S. Dean, of Waupun, Mo., for a gift of $10. J. F. BROWNE."

Friends who at any time are writing to this office and wish to send aid to Bro. Browne or to other workers in the South, brethren Tapley or Galloway, if they will enclose their gift, stating plainly its destination, it will be cheerfully forwarded.

—Bro. J. S. Persham, of Brookfield, Vermont, is deeply interested in the success of the State Convention to be held June 5th and 6th in Montpelier. He writes to all praying people in the State who are opposed to lodgery: "Will you all pray that God may overrule the State meeting as will be most for his glory and the best good of all concerned; and that such men may come from abroad as he sees best; that the friends here may sustain the meeting by every effort, their presence and their money." This first State meeting in Vermont is a most important gathering, as surely as it is an important event when the State that gave her electoral vote for Wirt and Elmaker, and has yet unrepealed statutes against the lodge oaths, shall again rally to the standard of reform.

—The old gentleman, whose skillful table for reckoning dates is mentioned elsewhere, was a youth in 1826, and was living in Massachusetts at the time of the Morgan abduction and murder. He was employed in a store owned by the father of Eli Bruce, the sheriff of Niagara county, New York, who figured so considerably in that fearful tragedy. Soon after the beginning of the popular excitement, Bruce came from western New York and held numerous agitated and secret consultations with the Freemasons who not only gathered in knots in the store, but also held meetings in the lodge night after night. And yet Rob. Morris is positive that the fraternity had nothing to do with the affair, and that no one knows what became of Morgan.

NEW HAMPSHIRE'S PART.

Bro. J. P. Stoddard, General Agent of the National Christian Association, has purchased a building in Washington, D. C., for the headquarters of Anti-masonry at the capital of the nation. He calls upon the Anti-masonic Christians of the country to pay for the building which cost $8,000. He estimates New Hampshire's part at $50. Let the friends of anti-secrecy in this State be prompt in raising this small sum. Contributions and pledges may be sent to the Secretary of the N. H. C. A., and will be acknowledged in the Cynosure.

S. C. KIMBALL, New Market, N. H., Secretary.

INFALLIBILITY.—The Romanists are not the only people who assign to the Pope the attributes of Deity. For, as we read that God makes use of the weak things of earth to confound the mighty, so the Pope, though shut up in the Vatican by his own followers, makes use of a handful of poor, weak, distracted Irish to involve and confund the mightiest politicians of the United States. He sends forth these Irish as missionaries to convert the United States; and even compels General Butler, of the 33d degree, most puissent Sovereign Inspector General, and Governor of Puritan Massachusetts, to "wear the green" and honor St. Patrick. SO MOTE IT BE!

—Protestantism in Spain is said to consist of 32 churches—six in Madrid, two in Barcelona, three in Seville, and one in each of twenty-one other towns. There are 23 Missions in the rural districts, with Bible societies and schools for both sexes, with adult classes. If these 32 churches are all true to Christ and the Gospel, they should be a mighty power for good, and rapidly and widely extend the true faith throughout Spain.

AMERICAN POLITICS.

NOMINATIONS FOR 1884.

For President
JONATHAN BLANCHARD
OF ILLINOIS.

For Vice President,
JOHN A. CONANT,
OF CONNECTICUT.

PLATFORM.

We hold: 1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That God requires and man needs a Sabbath.

3. That the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is the true policy on the temperance question.

4. That the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

5. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by articles 13th, 14th and 15th of our amended Constitution should be preserved inviolate.

6. That arbitration of differences with nations is the most direct and sure method of securing and perpetuating a permanent peace.

7. That to cultivate the intellect without improving the morals of men, is to make mere adepts and experts; therefore, the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

8. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

9. That the government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

10. That maintenance of the public credit, protection to all loyal citizens, and justice to Indians are essential to the honor and safety of our nation.

11. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice-president of the United States.

SENATOR POMEROY, some of our American voters will remember, was not fairly represented in the last national campaign, since no letter accepting his nomination for the Vice-Presidency was ever published from him; nor was it known at this office until within a year that one had been written, promptly accepting the nomiuation, but never reached the hand of Mr. Nutting, the secretary. A letter written to Mr. Pomeroy from the Cynosure office also failed to reach him. What kind of a conspiracy unseen agencies may have planned we know not, but the failure of these letters was a singular coincidence. It perplexed some of our good friends who believed themselves slighted and doubted the firmness of the noble man whose record for more than a generation would disprove such a neglect. This matter should have been mentioned earlier in these columns for the honor of Senator Pomeroy and the satisfactiou of the loyal men who voted for him in 1880.

POLITICAL CURIOSITIES.

The political press, while generally quick to mark any movement, however significant, which has the remotest bearing on national politics, has omitted general notice of the candidates and principles of the American party. The Inter Ocean seems but just to have learned of them, though the Cynosure is sent regularly to its office. The following editorial note appeared the other day in its columns:

"At the risk of being thought a little previous the National Christian Association has entered the Presidential field with a ticket headed by the somewhat widely known Rev. Jonathan Blanchard, of Illinois. The same association took a small hand in the campaign of 1880, although no distinct record was made of the votes polled by that party. It cardinal points are: Death to secret societies, saloons, and wars of all kinds. The David of this Jonathan is John A. Conant, of Connecticut. A part of the 1696 scattering votes cast in 1880 were no doubt polled by the Blanchard party, and for aught that appears there has been no falling off since then in its strength."

But the strangest paragraph came Wednesday night from Washington, and is printed in the same paper as the above. The idea that Secretary Stoddard should be hunting up a candidate for the Presidency and offering it with authority to a colored gentleman from Mississippi who may be opposed to Freemasonry or not, is about as near the truth as the everage Washington correspondent seems able to guess of late. The note is printed as a curiosity. We shall next week be able to say how much, if any, truth there is in it:

"Register of the Treasury Bruce was asked yesterday, by Dr. Stoddard, of Chicago, and ex Senator Pomeroy, representing a new prohibition and anti-secret society party, to accept its nomination for the Vice Presidency in 1884. He declined. They offered him the nomination for the Presidency. He declined. They asked him to suggest some other colored man. He suggested Frederick Douglass. They objected on the ground that he was a resident of the District of Columbia, and withdrew. This offer was made in a highly complimentary way. Register Bruce said in reply, that, while he appreciated the honor, he could not forsake the Republican party, even upon such temptation."

—After the above was written, the Inter Ocean of Friday, 4th iust., appeared with an editorial note which must appear with the above to complete the picture. It does not, to be sure, give much credit to the Chicago press for accuracy in detailing political events. We hope they are more faithful with their own parties. The Inter Ocean editor says:

"The Anti-masonic party already has a candidate for the Presidency in the field in the person of Dr. Blanchard, of Wheatou University, and is looking about for a candidate for Vice President. Register Bruce indignantly declines the honor, and it has been decided not to tender it to Fred Douglass, because he resides in the District of Columbia."

RELIGION AND THE STATE.

A most valuable article on this subject, from the able and well-trained pen of the late Professor Taylor Lewis, L. L. D., appeared in the Princeton Review of March, 1879. The article well merits the very serious and earnest consideration of all Christian statesmeu. * * Religious neutrality is the declared policy of the British India Government; and a better illustration of the impossibility of such neutrality, is nowhere to be found than that which is manifest in the past history and present practice of this Government. It seems to have been modelled after the pattern and principles of the old Roman Empire, as described by Gibbon. In his accouut of this Roman policy Gibbou says: "The various modes of worship which prevailed in the Roman world were all considered by the people as eqnally true; by the philosophers as equally false; and by the magistrates as equally useful." These same views and principles have obtained in India; especially has the idea of making the various religions useful to the state obtained with most British magistrates in India, with the single exception that, knowing they were regarded by the natives as representatives of Christianity, their care to maintain strict ueutrality has led them to keep their own religion more or less under disabilities, while favoring all others. This has appeared in former times in the dismissal from the service of the state, of native couverts to Christianity, for no other crime than their conversion; and it still appears in the system of education supervised by government. The Christian Scriptures have been disallowed and interdicted, while other so-called Scriptures have been freely tolerated in schools and colleges, and some institutions have been founded in the special interest of Hinduism and Islam and their sacred books. Undertaking to protect each religionist in the rights and practice of his own faith against the attempts to induce conformity, the officers of the British Government have themselves conformed to the views and practices of each false religion in turn, supporting from the state treasury both Hinduism and Mohammedanism, attending heathen festivals in their official capacity, and thus openly and directly helping infidelity, as if this were a special favorite, and helping the false religions of the country as if these were next in favor. This attitude of British officials in India is well stated in the Church Missionary Intelligencer for February, 1879, p. 67:

"Without any formal or absolute denial of our faith, we have been ashamed of it and indifferent to it. Our Christianity, with its corresponding obligations, has been looked upon as an encumberance, not a help; it has been a perplexity to us, not the source of our strength. At times we have all but abnegated our faith; often we have dealt with it as an exclusive possession not to be imparted to our heathen fellow subjects. The utmost we have ever officially ventured upon have been a few timid and uncertain references to it, uttered in very faltering toues. Our treatment of the volume which contains the oracles of God aptly represents the general tone of our conduct. Not without serious misgivings and a good deal of anxiety as to possible risk, it has, since 1854, been allowed to take its place on the shelves in the libraries of our Government institutions, where, with much more alacrity, the Vedas and the Koran were established. It might be there consulted by curious inquirers; but, if any of their teachers had the will, they had not the liberty, to educate them out of it, except in their own homes. This is the standard which man has set up. It may be denominated the standard of expediency—of moral weakness—but a number of the wise of this world hold it to be a very ingenious compromise, well calculated to ensure the permanency of our rule. Under the plea of non-interference with liberty of conscience, we leave men in ignorance of the way of salvation."

Recognizing the fact, that while avowing religious neutrality, the government, by means of its schools, undermines and destroys the religious views and convictions of its pupils, the same organ declares:

"We repeat that in the educational system hitherto pursued, a great wrong has been inflicted on the people of India. We have no right to interfere with their religion unless we are prepared to present them with a better.

"No government has a right to irreligionize its subjects; nor can it be surprising that a government which so deals with the native youth entrusted to its care, should become an object of bitter hatred to thousands in the land. For what must be the feelings of Hindu parents when they receive back a youth from a government college and find him a blasphemer of their gods, and in temper and bearing just what infidelity makes a man—proud, imperious, a despiser of his parents; in short, a new and evil element in Hindu life; a root of bitterness, and a fearful aggravation of its pre-existing misery?"

On this point a distinguished scholar of England, after a visit to India, and a careful examination of this educational system, writes: "It is true that things go smoothly and quietly, but this is attained by ignoring, not only the inevitable results of early training on the character, and the great needs of human nature, especially in the East, but by also ignoring the responsibility which devolves on the government that assumes the entire control of direct education to all. If, therefore, while fanaticism is raging around, there is a calm in our schools and colleges, it is an ominous and unnatural calm of impossible continuance —the calm of the centre of the cyclone!"

The most intelligent and well informed Hindus are no better pleased with this policy of the British officials than their Christian subjects are. The Indian Mirror, the ablest organ of these intelligent and educated Hindus, says:

"The government is neutral, forsooth! The very policy which tolerates Milton and tabooes the Bible, quietly connives at the study of the Ramayana and Mahabharata of the Hindus, and tolerates, besides, the reading of any quantity of the literature of free thought and scepticism. It is this very neutrality which is becoming dangerous to the morals of the youth of this country; for it is a neutrality which means anything and everything. It may Christianize, it may Hinduize, or it may turn lots of us into scoffers, sceptics, or unbelievers. We think the neutrality of the Government ought to be more honest. Either there ought to be no religion taught, directly or indirectly, or the authorities should forego their squeamish doubts and boldly introduce the Scriptures of the world as text-books. The simple reading of the Bible, or the Upanishads, or the Koran, will not convert India. If the conversion of India had depended upon books, it ought to have happened long ere this. Abercrombie, Reid, Hamilton, Whatsley would long ago have Christianized us. The fact is that the Scriptures of different nations are not so necessarily important in the light of their ability to convert, as they are indispensible in the way of acquainting us with the best thoughts of the best of men. It is the Bible which has moulded the European character; and can any study of the European literature be complete without a perusal of the very book which has influenced it for the best? The Upanishads and our two great epics contain the entire soul and spirit of the Indian nationality. And can we forego the temptation of reading them? Government has inaugurated, and partly carried out, a plan of bringing out books written in direct accordance with its policy of religious neutrality, and nothing, we can assure it, has been duller reading than they. The reason is not far to seek; for the best thoughts of our best men cluster round their dearest interests. It is religiou, far more than anything else, which has given philosophy, science, and art the charm and interest which attach to them. More than half the periodical literature of the day is saturated with the spirit of religiou. How, then, we ask, can education be properly imparted which does not draw upon the very fountain-head from which the best literature of the day derives its freshness and life? English education is nothing without the Bible, in the same way as the study of Sanskrit is nothing without the Vedas. We have come across young men who are unable to use the periodical literature of the day, simply because they are ignorant of the vast religious controversies which are carried on in the midst of it. As a matter of education, therefore, if not for any other purpose, the study of the Scriptures should form the most important part of the curriculum of every school."

Let it be duly noted, that the argument and view here urged are presented by educated and thoughtful Hindus, who have some right ideas of education and morals, but have not at all avowed their faith iu Christianity.

A careful-study of the entire history of British rule in India fully confirms the view of Taylor Lewis, that "Neutrality of the State in morals and religion, is a thing impossible;" and even the non-christian subjects of the British India Government are outspoken in their convictions that the attempt to maintain such neutrality is greatly to be deprecated, and to be unconditionally condemned and rejected.—Missionary Review.

The Worshipful Master of Lodge No.——— when asked by the writer a short time ago if he was a member of the church replied, "that he had no decided opinion on religion." That he "was not a Bible student." Yet this man continues to obligate candidates on the Bible and tells them it is one of the great lights in Masonry; and Christian men will leave the services of God's sanctuary where God delights to abide, and go hoodwinking into the preseuce of this worshipful master inquiring for light, when his own admission is, "I am not a Bible student." Now "if the blind lead the blind, they shall both fall into the ditch," says the author, "that light which lighteneth every man that comes into the world. Fellow-men, beware of blind guides.—Banner of Truth,

THE HOME.

THOU HAST THE DEW OF THY YOUTH.

Psalm cx. 3.

The young day brakes and the fresh bud wakes
Bathed in a crystal dew;
To the genial sky spreads its blushing dye
And breathes its fragrance too.
This is the hour that we prize the flower—
Oh, seize the precious truth,
That to Him in heaven should be sweetly given,
The dewy hours of youth!

Noon's thirsty ray shall steal away
The scent from its golden cup,
And the feverish breeze on the petals seize
And drink the fragrance up.
To that loved breast where thou caressed,
Reposed in joyous hour,
Thou would'st not bring that wasted thing,
A ruined, withered flower!

Then dread to bring such offering
To him, thy Friend more true;
Thy young heart's vow present him now,
Fresh in its morning dew.
E'er grief or care or sin impair,
Thy loveliness of youth,
The treasure bear, fresh, pure and fair,
To him the God of truth.

UNCONVERTED CHURCH MEMBERS

One of the saddest features of the present evil times is the immense number of unconverted, and therefore unsaved church members, found in all denominations. This is no doubt largely due to the unfaithfulness of preachers who, unlike the apostle, can not say, "I am pure from the blood of all men," because, unlike the apostle, they are unable to add, "I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God," (Acts 20: 26, 27). No man can declare all the counsel of God concerning the utter corruption of the human heart, the entire worthlessness of the flesh even in its most attractive forms, the inability of any and every church on the earth to save, the absolute necessity of the new birth, and the certainty of an everlasting hell for unbelievers, and be popular; and with thousands in the pulpit, the main thing is to be popular at any cost.

Besides this, there is the pressure of a strong desire to succeed, to build up one's own sect, to gain reputation and renown as a pastor or evangelist, to wield a powerful influence in connection with ecclesiastical affairs; and hence people are urged to join the church, before they have passed out of death into life. Then there are more than enough of poor fools in the pulpit, who imagine that if they can only induce persons to join their own particular church, to be baptized in a certain way, or by some kind of minister authorized to administer the ordinance, all has been done that is necessary; and like the Pharisees, who were ignorant of God's righteousness, going about to establish their own righteousness by legal obedience and ceremonial observances, they make the dupes of their ignorance two-fold more the child of hell than themselves.

Well, such false prophets might find searching admonitions in God's Word, if they would read them. "Son of man, I have made thee a watchman unto the house of Israel: therefore hear the word of my mouth, and give them warning from me. When I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way, to save his life; the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thine hand," (Ezek. 3: 17, 18). Such a minister may put into the building a lot of wood, hay, stubble, but it will all be burned at the coming of Christ, and he himself will be saved, provided he is converted, "yet so as by fire," (1 Cor. 3: 11–15). "Many," says Jesus, not few, but "many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity," (Matt. 7: 22, 23).

If thus it shall be with false prophets, how will it be with unconverted members of the church? Let the same Witness, who is "the truth," reply in his own words. "When once the master of the house is risen up, and hath shut to the door, and ye begin to stand without, and to knock at the door, saying, Lord, Lord, open unto us; and he shall answer and say unto you, I know you not whence ye are: then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence, and thou hast taught in our streets: but he shall say, I tell you, I know ye not whence ye are; depart from me all ye workers of iniquity," (Luke 13: 25–27). It is not enough, therefore, to go to the Lord's table, to eat and drink in his presence, or to hear his teaching; for except a man is born again by the Holy Spirit through faith in Jesus Christ, as revealed in the Word of God, he can never enter into the kingdom of God, but shall most certainly be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of his power.

It does not make a particle of difference what Canon Farrar, or Mr. Beecher, or Canon, or Mr. or Doctor, or Professor Anybody else, may say; for one word of Jesus Christ is worth a thousand million volumes of their speculations and theories, and "sweet" talk about God and eternity. They may write in very pretty language that he is too merciful to punish his creatures forever, but if they do not cease from their perverse ways in blinding souls to the truth, they will find that he is just enough to require the blood of the lost at their hands, and to shut them up in hell.

Oh, it is unspeakably painful to think of the multitudes in various ecclesiastical organizations, who give no evidence whatever that they know Jesus as a personal Saviour. They deny the inspiration of the Scriptures, they avow infidel sentiments, they are thoroughly wedded to the world, they live in sin, they are precisely like the children of the devil in their principles, their aims, their amusements, their conduct and their conversation; and yet their fear is quieted because they belong to the church. They imagine that all is well, while all is ill with them, and perhaps fatally ill; for it is not probable that they will be aroused from their slumber of death, until it is too late to escape the tremendous consequences of their delusion.

There is nothing for which the children of God should more earnestly pray than for the power of the Holy Ghost to attend the truth to the hearts and consciences of these dead members. Of course it is difficult to reach them by human instrumentality, for as a rule they will not listen to a man who preaches the Gospel; but it is not difficult to reach the throne of grace in their behalf, and surely no class stands in greater need of earnest, importunate prayer. Moreover those who have received Christ, and are therefore born again, should seek opportunity to talk to them kindly but faithfully, and to put into their hands tracts and little books, that plainly show how and what it is to be saved. True Christians in all the congregations of the land are doubtless acquainted with some, who perhaps sit in the adjoining pew, but who, even in the judgment of the largest charity, know nothing whatever of the power of God's converting grace. Let them send one of these little printed messages of truth to such, setting forth simply and clearly the way of salvation, and let their prayers attend it for God's blessing.—The Truth.

OBEYING GOD RATHER THAN MEN.

A GLIMPSE AT EARLY CHRISTIAN LIFE.

Not merely at church, but at home also, in their vocations and on the street, Christians desired to appear as Christians. They guarded with the greatest care against any connection with heathenism; they avoided with the utmost conscientiousness everything which could in any way be construed as a denial of their faith. Difficult, indeed, must have been their task, for their entire life was compassed by a network of heathen customs which a Christian must every moment rend if he would remain true to his God.

Many special relations of life brought the Christians into still more difficult situations. A master would order a Christian slave to do something wholly unobjectionable from a heathen point of view, but sinful according to a Christian standard, and yet the slave was completely in the power of his master, who could have him, if disobedient, tortured and even killed. How should the Christian wife, who had a heathen husband, fulfil her Christian obligations, attend divine worship, visit the sick, entertain strangers, distribute alms, without offending her husband? How could the officer or the soldier perform his duties without denying his faith? For long the two callings were deemed incompatible, and the officer preferred to resign his position, the soldier to leave the ranks, rather than to give up his Christian profession. Those who could not do this were often obliged to purchase fidelity to their Lord with their blood. Many a person also, in order to become and remain a Christian, must have relinquished the trade or employment which brought him a livelihood. All who had obtained a support by the heathen cultus, servants and laborers in the temples, idol makers, sellers of incense, as well as actors, fencing masters in the gladiatorial schools, etc., were admitted by the church to baptism only on condition that they should abandon their occupations, and whoever as a Christian engaged in such employments was excluded from fellowship.—From Uhlhorn's Conflict of Christianity with Heathenism.

A BRUTAL OUTRAGE.

The National Monitor states that "Bishop J. P. Campbell, D.D., had been attending conferences as an associate of Bishop Dickerson, in Georgia, and bought a first-class ticket on which to return to Philadelphia. He bought the ticket at Macon via Atlanta, Chattanooga, Nashville, Louisville, Cincinnati, Pittsburg to Philadelphia. On reaching Macon he took the first-class coach on the Western & Atlantic road, which his ticket called for. He was roughly ordered out, and told to go into the pen provided for 'niggers.' After being forced to enter this pen, he was subjected to an almost incredible assault. Bitter oaths were hurled at him, and a pistol was drawn on him and held within three feet of his head, while all kinds of abuse and threats were heaped upon him. He opened not his mouth and thus escaped. The colored porter of the train refused through fear of personal harm, to to give the name of any one employed on the train."

When an American citizen can be thus treated with no reasonable hope of redress, it is time for honest men to cease boasting of "equal rights" and "popular government." Not only colored men but all men are unsafe when one man can be thus insulted and abused with impunity.

HOUSEHOLD HINTS.

PLANTS GROWING IN WINDOWS.—Thousands who try to grow plants in pots, tubs or boxes, fail mostly because they let the pots be exposed to the hot sun. Now we never see the roots—that is, the part which draws nutriment from the soil—fully exposed to the sun in a state of nature, and this should teach window gardeners to shade the pots and boxes in which their plants grow. Another cause of failure is allowing the leaves (being in reality the lungs of the plant) to get dirty; it is imperative that they should be kept clean. I have often been asked why plants did not do well in windows, and it is often difficult to answer without seeing the plants, but the general failures occur from the causes above named, for it stands to reason that if half the roots of the plant are burned off repeatedly and the leaves are killed with dust, sickness will be the result. It is easy to clean off the dust by taking a little brush or broom and dipping it in water and flirting over the leaves of the plant two or three times in a week. Try it, ladies.—Prairie Farmer.

CLEANING CARPETS.—By far the hardest work in housekeeping consists in taking up, cleaning, and putting down Brussels carpets. I think that by following my method of sweeping a carpet the evil day may be postponed three years, if not longer. About once a month I take a pail two-thirds full of warmish water, put in it a tablespoon of ammonia, take a large cotton rag, and without wringing it quite dry, go over the carpet thoroughly, not rubbing them, but taking up every particle of dust. The advantages of this method are:

1. No dust is raised.
2. The furniture need not be moved.
3. It kills moths.
4. You can get spots off your base-boards at the same time.
5. If one room is taken per day, it really is easier than sweeping.
6. It keeps the carpet bright and fresh. In the center the room I occasionally use a carpet sweeper.

I never let a girl touch a broom to my china closet or dining-room floor. Nothing injures house-plants like dust, and girls generally sweep with such a rush that they raise twice as much as one would one's self. Moreover, I never have found them wildly anxious to clean off pantry shelves.—Ex.

TO AVOID DROWNING.—It is a well-known fact, says the Scientific American, that any person of average structure and lung capacity will float securely in water, if care is taken to keep the hands and arms submerged, and the lungs full of air. Yet in most cases people who are not swimmers immediately raise their hands above their heads and scream the moment they find themselves in deep water. The folly of such action can be impressively illustrated by means of a half empty bottle and a couple of nails, and the experiment should be repeated in every household until all the members—particularly the women and children—realize that the only chance for safety in deep water lies in keeping the hands under and the mouth shut.

Any short-necked, square-shouldered bottle will answer, and the nails can easily be kept in place by a rubber band or string. First ballast the bottle with sand, so that it will just float with the nails pointing downward, then by turning the nails upward the bottle will be either forced under the water at once, or will be tipped over so that the water will pour into the mouth, and down it will go. To children, the experiment is a very impressive one, and the moral of it is easily understood. It may prove a life-saving lesson.

ICE IN THE SICK ROOM.—Mention is made in a foreign paper of a plan pursued by an ingenious physician for ensuring a supply of ice for use in sick rooms during the hottest nights, and without disturbing the patient. This plan is to cut a piece of flannel about nine inches square, and secure it by a ligature round the mouth of an ordinary tumbler, so as to leave a cup-shaped depression of flannel within the tumbler to about half its depth. In the flannel cup so formed pieces of ice may be preserved many hours—all the longer if a piece of flannel from four to five inches square be used as a loose cover to the ice cup.—Floral Cabinet.

To Remove Foreign Bodies from the Eye.—A medical eorrespondent of the Lancet makes a suggestion which may prove useful on emergency to some of our readers. He says, "In consequence of the difficulty I experienced in removing from a patient a portion of steel bedded in the cornea, which did not yield to the spud or needle, some other means became neeessary. Dry, soft, white silk waste suggested itself to me, and was wound round a thin piece of wood, so as to completely envelop its end. This soft applieation was brushed once backward and forward horizontally over the part of the corner where the foreign substance seemed fixed. To my astonishment it was at once entangled by the delieate but strong meshes of the silk, and was withdrawn with the greatest ease, caught by the same. A gentleman, in turning steel at a lathe, suddenly felt that a portion had entered his eye. He went at onee to a surgeon, who, with the most skillful manipulation, failed to extract the same, saying it would soon work out of itself. The next morning the patient saw me, having suffered severely since the aecident, and on the first application the portion of steel was extraeted."

LIVES OF CELEBRATED WOMEN.

SARAH MARTIN.

In the parable of the talents the Saviour clearly teaches that he who has only one talent is under obligation to lay it out for God as certainly as if he had ten. Nor should any one permit himself to neglect this duty, on the plea that the one talent can accomplish nothing. Indeed, we have many examples where the one has accomplished far more than the five or the ten in other hands; and Sarah Martin's life furnishes just such an example, as will be seen by our sketch.

She was born in Norfolk, England, in 1791. It was the period of the French Revolution, and England was overrun with the atheistic doctrines of France, and little was done to elevate the masses of the people. The idea that a Christian education could do more to maintain security for life and property than brute force, had not yet been extensively adopted. But what could this child of poverty do to promote the acceptance of this important truth? We shall see. She was the daughter of a shoemaker, but was early deprived by death of both her father and mother, and committed to the care of a widowed grandmother, equally poor with her parents, as far as this world's wealth was concerned; but rich in faith, and an heir of the kingdom. Accordingly, she sought to impress upon Sarah's mind those precious truths which had been her solace in the past and her hope for the future. But by the time Sarah was twelve years of age she manifested a decided aversion to the Bible; but, having a taste for reading, she devoted her time to other books, such as the Spectator, Shakespeare, and other English poets. Her mother's Bible she hid away, so that the sight of it should not reproach her. But one Sabbath morning, in the nineteenth year of her age, she, in pursuit of pleasure, left her home and walked to the neighboring town of Great Yarmouth, and, passing by a place of worship, out of mere curiosity entered. The sermon she heard was on the text, "We persuade men," and strangely affected her. The hidden Bible was soon taken from its hiding-place, and soon she found the light of the knowledge of God in the face of Jesus Christ; and, having experienced the blessedness of peace with God, the young dressmaker, for she had been working at that trade from her fourteenth year, now sought to tell others of new joys. She at once became a teacher in the Sunday-school, and began to visit the sick wards of the workhouse, and became a ministering angel to many of the friendless ones in their dreary prison home. The Edinburgh Review, speaking of the work done by Sarah Martin at that period, thus describes the condition of the prisoners in Great Yarmouth Jail: "The doors were simply locked upon the prisoners. Their time was given to swearing, gambling, playing, fighting and bad language, and their visitors were admitted from without with little distinction. The whole place was filthy, confined, unhealthy, and its occupants were infected with vermin and skin diseases." For years Sarah Martin desired to visit these poor prisoners, and read to them out of that book which she found so full of consolation to her own heart, but she could not muster up sufficient courage to make the attempt until the year 1819, in the twenty-eighth year of her own age. Her first application was refused, but she persevered and at last was admitted and permitted to read the twenty-third chapter of St. Luke to a guilty culprit in her cell, and received tears and thanks from that once cruel heart. This encouraged her to make further efforts, and as often as she could spare time from her daily labor she visited the gloomy prison, and read the Scriptures with its inmates. She found the most of them miserably ignorant, and she began to teach them to read and write. But this could not be done efficiently in the few hours that she had hitherto taken from her daily labor; so she resolved to make the sacrifice of giving one whole day to this purpose, although it decreased her slender income by one-sixth. For three years she continued this ministry, and day by day earned her daily bread as seamstress, meditating as she labored what she could say and do to benefit these poor outcasts. In addition to her religious work she came to the conclusion that the prisoners must have something to do to save them from the curse of idleness. Accordingly, with money which she solicited, she purchased goods, and cut them out in her home at night, and gave them to the women prisoners to make, paying them so much for each garment, and then selling them. Finally she formed a society called "The Female Prisoners' Employment Society," which accomplished much good, both morally and materially. She soon also found suitable employment for the men, making straw hats, bone spoons, etc. Thus this poor dressmaker, with the motive power of love to Jesus in her heart, accomplished more for the reclamation of these prisoners than the so-called wise legislators, who from year to year were discussing the project as to what could be done to elevate and improve this class of the population. Finally the magistrates of the city saw and acknowledged her good work, and voted to pay her the sum of twelve pounds, some sixty dollars, per annum. Five dollars per month for her valuable services—a miserable pittance, but of great value to her. At first she doubted whether she ought to accept of it, lest it might be supposed she was doing her work with a selfish motive, viz.: to secure wages, and thus create prejudice against it. Now she gave herself wholly to the work, and all her projects of reading, writing and working were carried on under her skillful management, and her work was not in vain—many were reclaimed and commenced a career of usefulness through the instrumentality of her teaching. Her evenings were spent frequently among the sick in the workhouse or in the city, and, as her biographer writes, in the "Book of Noble English Women," to which we are indebted for the materials of our sketch: "Many a dim eye lighted up with pleasure when she entered at the door; many a sore heart was strengthened by her soothing words of consolation and her accents of tenderness; many were the blessings showered upon her for gentle ministrations, for smoothed pillows and holy words of peace, for the sympathizing presence of the hand and the sisterly kiss. Many a poor sufferer, in the isolation of the sick room, fancied he or she had entertained an angel unawares."

It was not so much the work she did, although that was certainly valuable, and all the more because of the circumstances under which it was done, as the fact that she became a teacher of others, and showed to philanthropists and legislators that even the most degraded could be reached and lifted up through the influences which Christianity supplied: Accordingly, there has been a great reformation in Great Britain respecting the treatment of prisoners since that day, and Sarah Martin deserves to be held in everlasting remembrance for her share of the work.—Christian Press.

The Bright Boy and the Rats.—An ingenious twelve-year-old boy, of Chester county, Pa., has devised a novel plan of getting rid of the rats which infest his father's cellar. He has constructed out of old fruit-jars a battery of three Leyden jars, which he connects, and places upon a large iron plate which touches the tinfoil on the outside. The bait is so arranged that, when the rat steps upon the plate and siezes the bait, he at once makes the connection between the outside and inside of the jars; and they are discharged through his body, killing him literally as quick as lightning. The boy charges the jars by means of an electric machine, also constructed by himself. He ran a couple of wires through the floor to the cellar from the room above, and as soon as he would hear a rat squeak he would immediately re-charge the battery. The first time he put the machine in operation he slaughtered twenty-five rats in the space of three hours, and in two days the cellar was entirely cleared of the pests.

TEMPERANCE.

—Fortifying the stomach with liquor is like pointing the guns inward and emptying them upon the garrison.

—Five thousand dead bodies are sent to the New York morgue each year, and four thousand five hundred of them are the victims of intemperance.

—There are over twenty "teetotal" mayors in England; while Scotland, with a population one-seventh that of England, has eighteen Provosts (mayors) who are total abstainers.

—Dr. Monroe made the following statement at a public meeting in Exeter Hall: "It is a great sorrow to me now to think that for twenty years I have recommended the drink. It make my heart ache, even now, to see the mischief I have made in years gone by—mischief never to be remedied by any act of mine."

—The Board of Trustees of the town of Payson, Ill., have disposed of the liquor question in a novel way by putting the right to license all sales of liquor into the hands of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and empowering them to prosecute all violations. It hardly needs to be said that the Union has decided not to license.

—Beware of French brandy! The report of the U. S. Consul at La Rochelle says: "That the production of genuine brandy ceased three years ago in the Cognac region, and that now exported is necessarily falsified." Of the method of falsification he says: "The greater part of the brandy of to-day is prepared from alcohol, obtained from grain, potatoes, or beets." After all, the worst thing in the compound is the alcohol.

—The Berea College people have secured from the Legislature of Kentucky a law forbidding the sale of intoxicating liquors within a radius of three miles from the college. The law has been printed on a handbill and is now enforced. A druggist in order to sell liquor must have a prescription of a regular physician. It was well this law was thus early secured, for, as Berea is to become a railway town, the need of it will be yet more pressing.

The following is from a resident and taxpayer of Edwards county, Ill., taken from a late number of the N. Y. Witness:

"Our county is small, but wealthy. Our people are industrious, contented and happy. Our courts clear their dockets in from two to four days. Our tax is light, except for school purposes. And the cause of all this is, there has not been a licensed saloon in our county for more than twenty-five years."

O hasten that tax payer's paradise for every county!

LICENSING THIEVES.

The excellent Union Signal, the consolidated organ of the W. C. T. U., tells the very pertinent story how the ancient Egyptians, according to Diodorus, had a license system for theft and thieves. Understanding that theft could not be entirely suppressed, the Egyptians had a theft-licensing bureau, with its accredited head. All who wished to engage in the thieving business reported themselves and were enrolled by the head of the bureau, their names and addresses being taken down. Whatever they stole was reported by them to the bureau. Then those from whom the goods had been stolen applied to the bureau to recover their goods and received them back, uninjured, on payment of a fourth of their value, which went to the thief, with a proper deduction, by way of license, to the bureau and the government. Of course no one could steal except those thus licensed; and it was for the interest of the licensed thieves to suppress all who were unlicensed, Thus a skillful and efficient body of thieves was trained and a considerable revenue secured for the State, possibly enough to support the system of public education. Still illicit thieving did take place; for there is papyrus evidence that an organized band of thieves, in the times of Ramesis IX, sacrilegiously plundered even the royal tombs and were executed therefor. A certain reformer, named Moses, raised a popular movement against this license system, and the legislation which bears his name is founded on absolute prohibition." "Thou shalt not steal" is the wording of the statute, which is enforced by stringent penalties. The application of all this story is evident.—N. Y. Independent.

HOW TO TREAT RUMSELLERS.

Whoever heard of the people of a community bowing and scraping to one who was known to be a murderer or a highwayman, whenever they met him, his foul presence entered their midst? The very idea is revolting to our good sense. Even God himself would justify our action in frowning upon such a character, or, to say the very least, in consigning him to a place of confinement beyond the reach of opportunity to exert his dire and dreadful influence in society. But how about rumsellers? Why, we are called upon to nod, and cringe, and pay respect to, and in every way treat this class of unfeeling, hard-hearted criminals, as if the business they follow were perfectly legitimate, and their presence in any community meant life and prosperity, instead of ruin and death. But why are we thus obliged to sleep, and wake, and tremble for our own and our family's safety, knowing there is in our very midst a being, whose sole business it is, to work ruin for time and never-ending eternity, upon those we love most and best? Because the law, that compounded evidence of human inconsistency, makes it necessary for this motley band of heartless plunderers to have ample space and opportunity to do their awful work. As well might we give room for him to do his work who simply sends the cold lead through the brain, or the cold steel through the heart, and then rifles the pockets of his cold and pulseless victim, as to license this awful traffic, which by slower process takes the life from the body and plunges the soul of the victim in irretrievable ruin and despair.

"Be we men and suffer such dishonor?
Men and wash not the stain away in blood?"

Yes, in blood if need be. It is the freeman's last resort. Our motto should be now, as in other days, concerning other important issues, "Peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must." Are we under the necessity of submitting to the ruin of our sons because a few, a very few, compared with the many who oppose the traffic, have made by various agencies, infernal and otherwise, a law licensing this awful business? We think not.

"Why hesitate? Ye are full-bearded men,
With God-implanted will and courage,
If ye dare but show it."

We have hesitated too long. Woman's tears and man's candid and eloquent appeals alike avail nothing. With fearful rapidity the rum power is gaining upon us. In vain we look to our national head-quarters for help. We have one unfailing resort, God and our manhood's powers. Shall we rise in this might and drive this destroyer from our midst? We may, we must, and, thank God we can. Pray not for the rumseller now, but rather pray for power to go forth as men.

"Men who their duty know, but know their rights,
And knowing dare maintain."

Yes, let us be men, and with the giant force of iron will and muscle strong, let us go forth and wipe this foul blot from our land. Who is not interested? Fathers, brothers, husbands, sons, lovers, what an army for the right, if but our forces do concentrate.

LITERARY.

"The Holy Spirit, by James H. Brookes," is the brief title of one of Dr. Brookes' most useful works. We know of none by any other author which attemps to treat this subject in so simple and direct a way. It is not a philosophical exposition, yet it introduces us to the profoundest philosophy; and while considerable portions are Scripture quotations, their beautiful and harmonious arrangement make the words like a new revelation. The different chapters of the Personality, Divinity, and Emblems of the Spirit, How he is manifested in the Old Testament, the Comforter, when given, the Seal, the Earnest, Relation to Christ, Love, Power, Witness-bearing, Names and Attributes. In the argument on the personality of the Holy Spirit the author rebukes a careless and irreverent habit of speech into which many have fallen. "It always shocks an intelligent and reverent believer," he says, "to hear the neuter pronoun it applied to the Holy Spirit," and shows that two or three passages where the Scriptures use the same method of speech are incorrectly translated. "Let no one regard this as hypercritical," he adds. "It is not at all a small matter, for it involves fundmental truth. If Christians would cease from the wretched habit of employing the neuter pronoun when speaking of the Holy Spirit, they would also cease from thinking of him as a merc influence exerted in some mysterious way over their minds and hearts; and they would bring their language into nearer correspondence with the faultless language of the Master, or of the Spirit himself. 'Hold fast the form [or as the Revised Version has it, the pattern] of sound words.' 2 Tim. 1:13." Dr. Brookes as ably combats the popular idea that the Holy Spirit was first given, not at Pentecost, but in the upper room on the resurrection day when he breathed on the disciples and said "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," (John 20:19–22). But they were also told to tarry in Jerusalem until they had received him in his power, and there is certainly no record of any particular manifestation without or within until Pentecost. The last chapter on the names, titles and attributes of the Spirit is an arrangement of Scripture passages such as we have never seen excelled in print. The book is very neatly bound and is published at the office of the Truth, No. 12 North Fifth Street, St. Louis, by Charles B. Cox. Price, in paper 15 cts.; cloth, 40 cts.

The Elzevir Library continues to issue at the lowest price, yet handsomely printed, some of the choicest literature of our time. Each number, of handy size, temptingly asks to be slipped in the pocket, ready for brief reading at any odd moment. Late numbers are Goldsmith's poems, the "Deserted Village" and "The Traveler," Burns' "Cotter's Saturday Night" and other poems, George Eliot's "How Lisa Loved the King" and Jean Ingelow's "Songs of Seven" and other poems, each two cents; "Highways of Literature" a choice work on books and reading, ten cents, worth ten times as much; "Cicero," a careful study of the public and private life of the great Roman orator with extracts from his speeches, letters and philosophical writings; "Demosthenes," a work of similar character on the great Grecian orator; "Herodotus," the works of the "Father of History," reproduced in brief and attractive form; and the "Commentaries of Cæsar," a similar condensation of Julius Cæsar's history of his wars in Gaul, Britain, Spain and Italy. The price of the last four fifteen cents each. Published by John B. Alden, 18 Vesey St., New York.

The Century for May is well represented in the columns of the Cynosure this week in extracts from Cushing's sketches of Zuni Freemasonry and Gladden's iconoclastic Christian League. Mrs. Jackson contributes the first of her finely illustrated articles on the establishment of the Jesuit missions in Southern California, and Edward Eggleston adds another to his historical sketches of the early history of this country. The Century has dropped the departments of Home and Society, the World's Work and Literature, to make room for "Open Letters" on various topics. Oliver Johnson takes occasion in this department to reply incisively to Rev. Leonard W. Bacon's sketch of his father's labors as an Abolitionist.

The St. Nicholas magazine for the month is one of the best illustrated numbers it has issued. The articles on Van Dyck, the painter, on birds and nest-building, and on black-board drawing are excellent, full of information and beautifully illustrated. Published by the Century Co., New York.

Vick's Monthly remarks upon the prospect from the 1st of May outlook for general crops and fruit. The cold and backward spring is not regarded as on the whole unfavorable, a good yield of fruit being the recorded effect of a late opening of the season. Eben E. Rexford contributes a poem in memory of James Vick who died a year since.

—An Almanac for all time, Past and Future, has been prepared after thirty years labor, more or less continued, in which upon a single sheet is arranged a table by which any date may be calculated from A. D. 1700 to A. D. 2100; and by a simple calculation which is illustrated plainly, any date from the Christian Era to the year 5000 can be computed. We have not verified the table and rule, since there are many days in 5000 years, but the author is satisfied of the accuracy of his calculations and the tabular arrangement by which dates are computed are certainly very ingenious. Copies may be obtained of the author, G. W. Paige, 107 Walnut St., Chicago, for 50 cents.

Gen'l Butler's path to the Presidency is not through the Tewksbury Alms House.—New Orleans Picayune.

So; it lies through the Masonic lodge, and through an avenue of pensioners of "both armies."

THE CHURCHES.

—Pres. C. A. Blanchard preached for the Tonica, Ill., church on the Sabbath.

—Bro. G. H. Filian, ordained as missionary to Syria at Wheaton last year, was to sail on Saturday from New York on the steamship Egypt of the National Line, for his chosen field of labor. May great grace be given him.

—The Leicester Street Baptist church of Perry, New York, which has been brought victoriously through severe conflicts for the Lord Jesus against the lodge adversary, is growing stronger in its adherence to reform truth. The church debt is almost paid.

—The Presbyterian Theological Seminary at Chicago now has its professorships all filled, Dr. Herrick Johnson having accepted the Chair of Sacred Rhetoric, and Dr. Marquis, of St. Louis, that of New Testament Exegesis.

—Sitting Bull has joined the Roman Catholic Church. Bishop Marty, of Dakota, announces that the old warrior has been converted at Fort Randall, and after his journey on the Missouri river to join his tribe on the Standing Rock Reservation, he will be received into the church with about 140 other Sioux converts.

—The great revival at Carthage, Mo., still continues, and the largest church cannot contain those who assemble. Over five hundred have professed conversion. All amusements and entertainments of a worldly character have been utterly deserted. The congregations refuse to be dismissed, but remain hour after hour.

—At Elmira, N. Y., within a week or two, seventy persons have professed conversion in the Free Baptist church under the influence of the evangelists, Clark Wilson and wife, of Towanda, Penn.

—Presbyterianism still continues to make rapid progress in Texas. Five churches are now nearly ready for dedication. San Antonia is to have a very fine house. El Paso has a desirable place of worship suited to the demands of that growing city. Lampasas, Cisco, and Springtown are each ready to dedicate a church home, and Brownswood and Dallas will soon be added to the list.

—Elder Isaac Price, an aged and wise counsellor among the German Baptists, in the last number of the Primitive Christian tells of the early times when the Dunker brethren lived in peace, when they had no press or schools for for higher education, and traveled by team for weeks to get to their great annual meetings. He grieves at the divisions that have taken place within a few years, and speaks of several changes that have brought them on. He speaks of one that reminds us of the rule of the "Christian League of Connecticut" described by Washington Gladden in the Century, which required unanimous consent and no voting for the adoption of any measure. Elder Price says: "The most fatal decision to our unity was that in favor of majorities. Bro. Kline said, 'We never have put on the Minutes a decision, or advice, unless passed by unanimous consent. We have got along this far by so doing. Let us then leave things as they are. If decisions are made by majorities, it will lead to sad results.' Alas, has it not done so? Now if Minutes can be revised so as to meet unanimous acceptance, and in the future all decisions shall be unanimous before put on the Minutes, and then be advisory only, then, I hope, we can all again unite in harmony, and be a united brotherhood, at least all who yet do adhere to Annual Meeting. But without that, we cannot be held together and further disintegration must follow."

—The Annual Meeting of the "Brethren" will be held at Bismarck's Grove, near Topeka, Kansas, in June. The railway lines to the south-west are preparing to carry thousands of pilgrims to that place.

—A Chicago daily prints the following note which is interesting from its relation to the early public life of President J. Blanchard; though not strictly accurate respecting the present: "In noting the death of the Rev. Dr. Boynton the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette calls the roll of the leading ministers of the gospel in that city who filled the pulpits thirty-five years ago when Dr. Boynton began his ministry in that city. Among the great men 'there were Thornton A. Mills, Joshua L. Wilson, Dr. Beecher, Dr. N. L. Rice, Mr. Lynn, Dr. Brooke, Dr. Johns, Dr. Sehon, Dr. Gurley, Bishop Purcell, Dr. Magoon, Dr. Fisher, Dr. Blanchard, Dr. Boynton. Every denominational pulpit was, so to speak, ably manned, and each sect had one or more representatives that it was proud of. These great theologians and pulpit orators are nearly all dead. Bishop Purcell and Dr. Blanchard are the only spared monuments of those days, and these, by reason of age, are no longer at the front. But the dead are not forgotten and will not be.'"

THE CHRISTIAN LEAGUE OF CONNECTICUT.

ITS EFFECT UPON SECTARIAN AMBITION.

"It is well known to many of you that the sectarianism which we are organized to fight is making its worst ravages on our Western frontiers. The strife of the sects for the occupancy of every new settlement is the scandal of Christianity. Every man knows this who has traveled in the West and found in the small towns, on an average, one church for every hundred inhabitants. From this afflicted region I have had letters not a few, rejoicing that this movement had begun at the East, and praying for the time when its tidal wave should begin to roll across their prairies and up their canons. From a shrewd observer, who knows that Western field thoroughly, and who is in the deepest sympathy with the Home Mission work, comes a letter from which I will read you a few sentences:

"'The real trouble now is with the intermediate agents of our churches. I mean the presiding elders, the synodical missionaries, and the district superintendents of missionary work. So long as our societies will appoint to such places men whose only qualification is business push—men of about the calibre of a good book-agent, men who could push a cyclopedia in a State—so long there will be confusion enough. I could tell of some in this great work that are perfectly unscrupulous. Our societies must be made to see that they must get men who will look at the work broadly, and build with eternity, not quarterly reports, in view. The policy of each missionary society should be expressed, not implied; and agents should be held to account for pushing in where not needed.'

"This extract shows that the responsibility for the state of things existing in the West belongs largely to the East. The power behind this pushing propagandism has its headquarters in Boston and New York. If you want to get at it, you can easily reach it. But let me give you another bit of the same letter. Speaking of the results of this sectarian scramble at the West, the writer says:

"'I am quite sure it is very seriously affecting the character of our ministry. Who but a mean-spirited man will consent to be one of five in a town of five hundred people? Then, is it not near to the sin against the Holy Ghost thus to misuse the gifts of the Spirit? What wonder ministers are scarce, when they are employed in this way, four or five crowded into a place where there is need of but one, and set in antagonism and rivalry, with no chance to develop any spiritual power? And all the while the world is full of heathenism! Really, this is the most serious phase of the question. A gift of the Spirit, a man furnished by the Spirit for the ministry, is a gift infinitely more precious than the money to feed him, and the misuse of such an one or the misapplication of the gift comes nearer to malfeasance than any misuse of funds.'

"This man writes out of his heart, you see. And he writes not unadvisedly. No man in the West is better qualified to judge. And I beg you to note what he says respecting the effect of sectarianism on the character of ministers. I confess that this was to me a flash of revelation. But who can question the truth of it? What kind of a Christian is the man likely to become, whose character is developed in these denominational bear-fights? What kind of a Christian is the man who is ready to rush into them? I tell you, high-minded young men will not do it. And many a young man, who would gladly give his life to pioneer work on the frontiers, turns back when he sees into what sort of scrimmage he is pretty sure to be driven.

"But I am only showing you the evils of this denominational strife. Of these you hardly needed to be told, though my correspondent may have thrown new light on their deformity. What I began to tell you was the good news that the Christian League has been heard of on the frontiers, and that its good seed is beginning to find lodgment in a soil where it ought to bring forth a hundred fold. We have heard some cheerful tidings here to-day, but none to me so significant as this which I read you from the representative of one of our Home Mission boards in the far West. He tells of a conference, lasting all day, between the Home Missionary representatives of four leading denominations, four men who have the oversight of two or three Territories. He says that they came to this conference with the Christian League in their minds, and this is his report of what came of it:

"'We did not organize; had no chairman or secretary, and passed no votes, but simply looked one another in the face, and tried to look the facts of the field in the face. We took up the case of each place—went from ——, on the ——, to ——, covering the whole field. We did not realize my highest ideas of such a meeting, which would be the consulting entirely as though we were of one denomination; but I believe it was a long step in the right direction. We have arranged not to go into a town where another denomination is at work, when there is any chance for misunderstanding, without consulting with the representatives of the church in that town, or with the superintendent of mission work. We have promised one another not to take advantage of temporary bad luck in getting ministers. We have arranged to exchange fields and properties, as far as possible, when it becomes evident that the best interests of the cause demand it. I have, for instance, given up our church at —— to the ——ists, as the people are nearly all of that faith and ask for a —— ist minister. The ——ists have given up a field to me. The ——ans promise not to enter a field where we have a church, though pressed by some to do so. We have arranged for another meeting in six months.'

"Now, I say that's the best report we have had to-day. It makes me feel more like shouting hallelujah! than anything I've heard for many a day. And if this were my meeting-house, and not the meeting-house of a very staid and undemonstrative body of disciples (laughter) I should call for three cheers for those grand fellows out West who have got the denominational devil fairly under, and who have set out to treat one another, in their mission work, like Christian gentlemen!"—Washington Gladden in the Century for May.

FARM NOTES.

PLANT MORE CHESTNUT TREES.

Owing to inexplicable causes, very little has yet been done to replace the fast disappearing native growth of the valuable chestnut. Its wood is one of the best for fence posts and rails on account of its great durability. It is also highly esteemed for wainscotings and other casings, and is often used for veneering. Its grain shows well when simply varnished instead of painted. Though not considered very valuable as fuel, it makes a brisk fire, and in heating power, dry chestnut wood falls only 15 per cent. or one-seventh, below hard maple, cord for cord, and is nearly equal to the soft maples.

For its fruit alone the chestnut is largely grown in many parts of Europe, and in this country the nuts almost always meet a ready sale at remunerative prices. In some northern provinces of Italy chestnuts are a chief article of diet, eaten not only boiled and roasted, but ground into meal and made into bread, puddings and cakes. The report just issued by the Italian Inspector-General of Forests, states the chestnut crop at six hundred and forty-six million pounds, grown on about half a million acres of chestnut forests, of which nearly eight million pounds were exported, bringing a return of nearly half a million dollars. In the Province of Lucca 18¾ per cent. of the entire land is devoted to growing the chestnut mainly for its fruit.

Single specimens, about dwellings and upon the road sides and in fields, make beautiful shade trees; they are little subject to disease or insects; they grow quickly, and live to a great age. Specimens in England and in Sicily are estimated at all the way from 800 to 4,000 years old. They grow best on sandy soil, but do well on any soil not wet and swampy.

The trees may be easily raised from the seed, if the nuts are not allowed to become dry before planting. Most nurseries supply young trees at moderate prices. There are millions of acres, especially on side hills and rocky land, fit for little else, which could be very profitably turned into chestnut orchards, and in a few years also supply a large amount of good timber. Let the reader look about and see if it is not worth while to start a lot of chestnut trees during this spring.—American Agriculturist.

TO CURE A FELON.

Dr. T. C. Brannon, in the Therapeutic Gazette, prescribes the following treatment for this painful malady:

Take of soft lye soap and flax-seed meal a sufficient quantity, stirring the meal in slowly with spatula or case knife, manipulating thoroughly, so as to form a salvé or poultice. Corn-meal is a good substitute for the flax-seed. Envelop the finger in this, applying snugly, and occasionally pressing it to bring it in closer contact. Renew the poultice every twelve to twenty-four hours. Don't try every prescription you may hear of. Depend on this. It will, if applied in time, abort the disease; if adopted later, it will bring it to a small "head" (if too far advanced to be "scattered"), when it may be picked almost painlessly.

SKIMMED MILK FOR HENS AND CHICKENS.

There is nothing better for laying hens in the spring than milk, after the cream has been taken off. We have tried it several seasons with complete success. With the milk given fresh from the dairy room every day, the fowls will need no other drink, and it will supply everything required in the way of animal food. The pullets fed with milk and corn, and a mixture of corn-meal and milk, through the cold weather, have given an abundant supply of eggs. Wheat bran is also a good article to mix with the milk. It is better to give the mixture a boiling and to feed it in the warm state, but this is not necessary. We have also found the milk one of the best kinds of diet for young chickens, soon after they come from the nest, to promote their health and rapid growth. Indian meal, ground coarse, and scalded with milk, is a perfect feed for them. As the grow older, grass, cabbage, or onions may be chopped fine and added to the daily rations. A portion of the milk on dairy farms, usually going to the pig trough, may be diverted to the chicken coop with great advantage. Eggs are worth twenty-five cents a dozen and poultry twenty cents a pound, when pork brings but ten cents a pound.—American Agriculturist.

EARLY LETTUCE.—There are very few people not fond of lettuce in the early spring. Having removed from the city, where early lettuce could be bought at the markets, I was much at a loss for this refreshing salad plant—at least, until quite warm weather. Knowing it to be quite hardy, I last autumn sowed some seed in a warm, dry spot, and in a week or two the plants were up. Before hard frosts I placed around my little patch some boards—to be particular, an old door-frame—and over this some loose boards, covering about two-thirds of the space, so that there was about one-third uncovered for light and air. It was where it got the best of the sun, sloping southeast, and it was a surprise to find how early I had young lettuce from this rude bed. Of course this will be of no benefit to those who have hot-beds and other conveniences for forcing vegetables. But to many of your readers I thiuk the knowledge may be useful.—Ex.

The unprecedented cold weather in Northern Dakota this winter, where the thermometer has gone as low as 42 degrees below zero, and has remained at 20 below for several days in succession, has demonstrated that cattle that have once become acclimated are not injured by the cold. The loss to the herds that have been exposed all winter is reported to be comparatively small, and the casualties are confined to animals that were brought into the country from warmer climates late in the fall.

A Bridgeport, Conu., man has, inside of a week, forced blossoms on a branch cut from a cherry tree. He kept it in water, and mixed with the water the first day five grains of nitrate of soda, and increased the dose one grain every day, giviug all the sunlight possible. Before long the buds began to swell, and finally burst, continuing in their growth until bunches of blossoms appeared. He declares that he will have full-developed cherries in two or three weeks.

ODDS AND ENDS.

"Grandpa, the sun is brighter in summer than in winter, is it not?" "Yes; and it's warmer, and enjoys better health." "Why does it enjoy better health?" "Because it gets up earlier."

"Is anybody waiting on you?" said a polite dry-goods clerk to a young lady from the country, who had just entered the store. "Yes, sir," replied the blushing damsel. "That's my fellow outside. He wouldn't come in the store."

The following is said to be a brilliant example of German wit: Child: "Herr Pastor, my mother sends me to say that my father died last night." Pastor: "Did you call a doctor?" Child: "No, Herr Pastor. He died of himself."

The sting of the bee, it is said, is scarcely discernable under a powerful magnifying glass. But the man who gets stung by a bee seldom has his microscope with him, and always imagines the sting to be about the size of a red-hot crowbar.

Mrs. Kate Thurman Hardin, widow of Chief-Justice Hardin, of Kentucky, once enjoyed riches, but she is now in destitute circumstances. "Her wretched home" is in Louisville, "on the fourth floor of an old rookery." She has eked out a living for herself and daughter dnring the last six years by sewing, Judge Hardin having left neither ready money nor property.

It is said that one spoonful of coarse powdered saltpetre to a pail of water will destroy potato bugs, squash bugs, and other insects. For roses it is unsurpassed. For maggots that work at the foot of squash vines, pour about a pint of the liquid on the root of each vine as soon as the pests indicate themselves.

Prof. Grant Allen, in the Popular Science Monthly, commences a paper on the subject of the origin of wheat, with this assertion: "Wheat ranks by origin as a degenerate and degraded lily." The idea that such a useful and necessary article should be "degraded" by being evolved from such a useless one may be science, but it is ridiculous, all the same.

An English servant-girl, who had returned from the United States, to visit her friends at home, was told that she "looked really aristocratic." To which she responded: "Yes, in America all of us domestics belong to the hire class."

"Where are your kids?" a society man asked, looking at the bare hands of a poor but deserving editor at Vanderbilt's party. "At home in bed," was the indignant reply. "Do you suppose I'd bring my children to a party like this?"

If the newspaper stories are true there is an invalid widow in Tennessee who deserves something more than honorable mention. She has not been able to stand or walk for twenty years. but some years ago she began to make shoes with a set of tools which her husband left her at his death. She persevered so that now, while sitting in bed with her tools beside her, she plies her trade successfully and has very nearly paid off the mortgage on her little farm.

The oldest timber in the world, which has been used by man, is supposed to be that found in the ancient temples of Egypt. It is found in the dowelpins in connection with stone work which is known to be at least 4,000 years old. These dowels appear to be of tamarisk or shittim-wood, of which the ark is said to have been constructed, a sacred tree in ancient Egypt, and now rarely found in the valley of the Nile.—Steuben Signal.

ANCIENT LAW MAKERS.

About the beginning of the Fifth Century, the Salians, after their settlemeut in Gaul, under their King, Pharamond, they framed a body of laws which have sinee been kuown as Salic; but at that time those law-makers knew nothing of the wouderful discovery which works harmoniously with nature's laws, and which is a positive boon to those suffering from Rheumatism, Gout or Neuralgia. We refer to that common sense remedy, Salicyliea.

HORSFORD'S ACID PHOSPHATE

is useful in dyspepsia. It gives the stomaeh tone and imparts vigor to the whole system.

Humors, Scrofula, Ulcers all vanish before Dr. Benson's Skin Cure. Internal and external.

"Dr. Benson's Celery Pills improved my nervous system." Rev. B. F. Taylor, Lawrenceville, Pa.

The Dowager Duchess of Galleira not long since bsetowed two splendid estates on the Pope. The way this old lady became so rich is curious. The late Duke possessed a fortune of 300,000,000 francs, which would, by the ordinary course of devolution, go to his only son. The heir, however, in his father's lifetime, declared that he intended to renounce the world. Instead of retiring to a cloister, as he would have done in the middle ages, he went in his twentieth year into the territory of Nice and applied for a situation as a village schoolmaster. His father regarded the thing as a mere freak, and sent his son every year 300,000 francs. The young man, however, sent this sum every year to Paris, requesting it should be expended on the poor. After three years the Minister of Instruction, finding out who the schoolmaster at Nice was, appointed him to a high official post, and his father dying about the same time, he became the Duke of Galleira and owner of immense wealth. He declined the post, and allowed his mother to use the fortune without interference, content with his position and income as a teacher at Nice.

DR. JOHN BULL'S Smith's Tonic Syrup

FEVER and AGUE

Or CHILLS and FEVER.

AND ALL MALARIAL DISEASES.

The proprietor of this oelebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE, CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. He refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to cure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and whole families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the general health. It is, however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medicine will not require any aid to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

The genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN J. SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP, of Louisville, Ky. Examine well the label on each bottle. If my private stamp is not on each bottle do not purchase, or you will be deceived.

BUSINESS.

It is a pleasure to speak of the encouraging features of our reform work and especially so of the increase in the number of our readers. We have not realized a "boom," but steady growth has been the rule and only a small number have withdrawn from our list. Our patrons have set us a good example by not "grumbling and finding fault" which we have endeavored to imitate. There are a few people in the world who seem to get a bad start and to stand "edgewise" all the way through, who never turn a "fair side" to friend or fellow until they make the "last turn" at the "Gate ajar," but fortunately from such we have largely escaped. We hope "to hew to the line," avoid discourteous personalities, merit and receive the increased patronage of those who love the truth, and report YOUR paper on a sound basis with a paying list before the autumn leaves turn yellow in the early frosts. Will you help as you have opportunity?

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

The storm centers last week swept further north and with less fury and destruction than in Mississippi. Wednesday afternoon and evening part of Iowa, southern Wisconsin and northern Illinois suffered from a rainfall of unusual severity, attended with high wind which prostrated buildings in many places, demolished a church in Evanston, near this city, and upset a schooner in the lake. The loss of life was very small, and of property will be chiefly felt upon the farm lands. On Sunday evening a tornado swept through part of Kansas City, demolishing buildings for a distance of two miles in a narrow path varying from one to two blocks in width. Singularly but three fatalities were reported, though several persons were mortally injured. Perhaps the most considerable indirect loss was to lake navigation. Chicago river became suddenly, from a sluggish tide of filth, a full and powerful currrent into the lake. A big lake steamer became unmanageable and swung around with the force of the stream, completely blockading it. It was finally got loose, when another propeller was swept into the same position by the strong current, and the two completely stopped navigation for nearly three days, though thirteen powerful tugs and six propellers joined their titanic strength to release the imprisoned steamers. The delay to the shipping is considered equal to a loss of $400,000.

The State legislatures of New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Michigan have refused to submit the question of constitutional prohibition to their constituencies. The Ohio voters have two propositions submitted, either of which may be voted or both rejected. Both repeal the present clause in the constitution forbidding license, and the first substitutes "regulation and taxation," that is, license; the second is entire prohibition. This arrangement looks like a political trick. The attorney general of the State decides that each individual voter may cast his ballot for both these propositions, or against both, or for one and against the other. If Ohio shall rise in her might she may throttle this infamous business, only let sufficient care be taken that no Masonic tricks be attempted as in Iowa to defeat the will of the people.

HON. S. C. POMEROY.

Governor Sherman, of Iowa, say the papers, "is conceded a re-election by many of his most intelligent opponents. His attitude on the prohibition question is conservative enough to command the support of all Republicans." If the temperance Republicans will inquire they may find that this commendably conservative attitude, which Gov. Sherman has assumed and hopes for re-election thereby, is no unimportant element in the drawbacks they meet on the way to constitutional prohibition. The supreme court has just decided again against the measure as passed. We do not wish to misjudge the court, but possibly a popular enthusiasm such as Gov. St. John of Kansas maintained, would have effected their decision. At least, had Iowa had a St. John for chief executive, none could doubt the complete triumph of prohibition. Sherman, loaded down with the obligations of thirty-three degrees of Freemasonry, and compromised by the affiliations which the lodge compels, can no more be depended on to lead his State to victory over the saloon curse than Albert Pike himself, who is his immediate superior in the lodge. Look to this, Iowa!

In Illinois the legislature had reached last week the high license bill, and several independent and candid men among the Democrats having taken an honorable stand for the measure, as an improvement upon former acts, it is likely to pass. Another bill is before the Illinois legislature intended to make drunkenness odious by imposing a fine or imprisonment upon the man who drinks to intoxication, the fourth offense being punished with imprisonment for a year. There are not a few drinking men whose good resolutions would be wonderfully fortified by a wholesome dread of punishment if such a law was enforced, and the vicious habit of treating would receive as great a check as from a statute aimed directly at it. But these measures are but temporary expedients which provide either for the collusion of the State with crime, or for an experiment which may work injustice and moral ruin to many men. Entire prohibition is the law of reason, of justice and of love.

The papers have for a few weeks told us of frequent arrests of young boys on their way West, bold and bloody deeds in their fancy and a walking arsenal without, the end of their journey being the extermination of Indians, robbing of trains, and a freebooting life in general. Without an exception their inspiration for such a life was the cheap, trashy boy's weekly papers, the life of the James brothers, or such vile stuff. These cases are arousing some attention from the teachers and guardians of children. At Cleveland the managers of the public library have banished the novels of Miss Evans, Mrs. Southworth and Mrs. Holmes; and it will be a reason of rejoicing when similar institutions throughout the country follow this lead, and clean their shelves of all such sensational stuff, which is ruin to mind and soul of every young person who becomes absorbed in them. A bill is before the legislature of New York making it an offense to put in the hand of a minor a dime novel or other book of fiction. The measure is so carelessly drawn that it may almost be regarded as in favor of the worst kind of trash—the cheap weekly papers. We need a prohibitory law against such stuff as well as against liquor and tobacco.

The theatrical performances of low traveling companies are of the same moral grade as the vicious literature. At Newburyport, Mass., a "Jesse James Troupe" was exhibiting lately, when one of the city pastors became emboldened to arrest them as corrupters of youth, and he has become a popular hero. He found some two hundred children under fifteen years of age attending these degrading performances, and in the court argued the case against them for two days with an audience of the best citizens of the city filling one of their largest halls. He had the satisfaction of seeing a number of the company bound over to a higher court for trial. It is not easy to see why the whole theatrical business is not also demoralizing and fit for the condemnation of the laws. The public sentiment which applauds the breaking up of a James Boys' troupe, and yet angrily threatens Dr. Herrick Johnson, when he proves that the modern theater is a sink hole of immorality and serves no purpose but to pander to vice, is in sad need of reformation.

The Philadelphia Irish convention evidently did not believe in seceders from Masonry or any other order. The Dublin "Invincibles," who are giving to the world the secrets of that desperate and murderous clan, are called in its resolutions "purchased wretches," and their testimony "lying averments." No doubt the fear or cupidity which led these men to reveal the secret crimes of their order were unworthy influences, not such convictions of truth and conscience as should have prevailed upon them; yet they were none the less under moral obligation to confess their revolting deeds. But the convention reprehends only their confession and the agents of the British government who drew it out; for the dark crimes of which they were guilty it has no word either of praise or blame. The spirit of the Irish nationalists has from the first been especially hostile to the informers, and in some instances has revealed a singular attitude of the Irish Catholic conscience towards the crime of murder. Father Walsh, the priest who has acted as treasurer of the Land League in this country was advised by Mr. Parnell to send aid to a widow Walsh in Ireland. He sent her $376 and explained the circumstances. Her two sons were convicted of murder; one was hanged the other sentenced for life. Father Walsh says that the widow not only knew her boys to be innocent, but even knew who committed the murder for which they suffered the penalty; yet she would not tell, preferring to let her children hang than to turn an "informer," as some "ignoble villains" are now doing.

DIPLOMATIC SHADOWS WITHOUT SUBSTANCE.

BY GEN'L J. W. PHELPS.

The presence of royal princes from Prussia and England at the approaching coronation of the Emperor of Russia means something besides a pageant. It means that England and Prussia stand shoulder to shoulder against French Jacobinism now, as they did at Waterloo some sixty years or more ago. Nihilism, that threatens the coronation ceremonies with dynamite, is a development of Jacobinism as Jacobinism was of Freemasonry.

But why should the United States be represented at the coronation by an officer of the navy and his staff? This singular action on the part of a republic towards absolute imperialism can mean only one thing; and that is a sympathy with the conservative powers of Europe as opposed to the anarchy of Jacobinism. But is there any substance in a measure of this kind coming from the United States? Let us see.

Nihilism is a secret organization, closely allied in essential characteristics with the Masonic lodge. But the lodge is the governing power in the United States, furnishing most if not all the officers of our government. The United States, though claiming to be Christian and republican, is in the same condition that Russia would be in were all her officers appointed by the Nihilists. When therefore a navy officer of the United States is ordered to be present at the coronation of the Russian Czar, does he represent the lodge-politics of the government, or the republic of the people? He cannot possibly represent them both.

A special mission from our republic to Russia on the present occasion ought to leave no doubt on the minds of men as to what it represents, whether it is the republic or the lodge. The influence that it is to exert on the important occasion is a moral influence, and no doubt therefore should be left by it upon the minds of men as to whether the United States can remain a nest of secret societies and still give a solemn expression of national sentiment against such societies. We Americans ought to know who is to have the credit of this diplomatic movement, our party which opposes secret societies, or the Republican party which is run by them. The Republican party should not be allowed to play fast and loose in this way any longer, and put an innocent face upon the lodge, as if it were the pious and honorable institution that it pretends to be. If the United States can oppose secret organizations at St. Petersburg, and at the same time foster them at home, there is evidence of a frightful degree of insincerity, which cannot fail to prove dangerous to the republic; for without perfect sincerity republics cannot exist.

Brigham Young, a Mormon Mason, was made governor of Utah by the Christian government of the United States, and received thereby an immense accession of moral support in practicing his deceptions upon the people of northern Europe. The question now is whether the moral force, or the substance of this diplomatic movement of our government in Europe, shall go to the benefit of the Masonic lodge or to that of the American party which is instituted for the especial purpose of abolishing the lodge. Shall the lodge be allowed, as the Mormon leader was, to make use of the moral power of a Christian republic for its own benefit?

This measure on the part of the government should encourage our American party to maintain its ground with firmness and determination. We should make no compromises nor concessions, but exact the full amount of deference that is due to our principles. Our American party represents the American republic, which no other party does; for the two other parties are mere Ku-Klux and Masonic lodges, operating under popular party designations. These lodges are two secret, irresponsible parties, as Nihilism is a secret political party; and their pretences to charity and piety, and other religious attributes are either preposterous errors or monstrous insincerities, under which no government can stand. When secret societies take to dynamite, it is time for every good man to discredit their religious pretensions.

DOING EVIL THAT GOOD MAY COME.

BY H. H. HINMAN.

In one of the growing towns of Iowa, I was sitting in the parlor of an excellent Christian lady when two other ladies called to solicit aid for the "Presbyterian Social." They were much interested in missionary and other Christian work, and were devising plans for its enlargement. In addition to the substantials and delicacies of the table, they had advertised an especial attraction for the evening, which would surely bring the crowd. It was a wheel-barrow race in the basement of the church, in which the smallest lady was to wheel the largest gentleman. This at ten cents a sight, would doubtless bring quite a little sum to their treasury, and help out the salary of the pastor. Like Saul of Tarsus these ladies "verily thought they were doing God service." They had never stopped to consider the practical influence of such an exhibition on the minds of the young who had gone to the house of God to mingle with his people. The only thought of the poverty of their treasury, the unpopularity of their church and the great need of enlargment in all their methods of usefulness.

If I had told them that they were fostering frivolity and worldliness instead of piety, and that those who did evil that good might come were "justly condemned (Rom. 3: 8) they would have thought me unkind; and yet such is the fruit that is apparent to all who look at the condition of the churches from the standpoint of the Gospel of Christ.

I met a amiable and cultured young man, a member of Dr. Buddington's church in Brooklyn, and an active worker in the Y. M. C. A. He was much interested in Christian labor, but could see no harm in dancing, card-playing or theatre-going, etc. He told me that he and his friends danced in the parlor of their pastor and with his approval; and that as a rule they had dancing at the meetings of the Sunday-school teachers. He thought much could be learned at the theater, and cited the example of some prominent Congregational ministers who attended. As to a social game of cards he saw no special harm.

This young man was not a Freemason, but despised the whole system, and yet with his ideas of religion, there was no good reason why he should not be one, or be anything else to which inclination might lead him.

The trouble with the churches is the pernicious doctrine that "the end sanctifies the means" and that Christianity is only a modified form of selfishness. The remedy is in insisting on the words of our Lord, "If any man will come after me let him deny himself, take up his cross daily and follow me."

FIFTY THOUSAND MEN.

BY ELDER NATHAN CALLENDER.

What the emergency? What the work? Who wants them? What the pay?

One question at a time and we will answer. The emergency is, that while the land is full of ministers, churches and religious journals, they are devoting themselves to the duties of paying "tithes of mint, anise and cummin while they omit the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy and faith." These teach the duties (?) of fashionable life, and petty rules of etiquette, while they ignore and even snub the momentous moral issues that hang like burning mountains over the people.

Take an example. In the paper evolved from the peerless and grand old American Baptist, not we believe a "survival of the fittest," we find quoted from the St. Nicholas, a piece condemning eating pie with a knife, etc. This grave lawgiver says, "If games are proposed do not say that you will not play," etc. This saintly counsel is repeated from the St. Nicholas by a retrograde sheet while it has refused to publish on one of the gravest moral questions now pending in the world.

Men are not needed to herald the stale trash admired and worshipped by the world. The press, secular and religious, and even the church and pulpit, will unite to blow the chaff full into our faces while starving souls echo the sentiment, "What is the chaff to the wheat saith the Lord?" The world needs, the church needs, God needs fifty thousand men, yes men, to "go forth weeping, bearing precious seed, (not chaff) that they may in due time return again with rejoicing bringing their sheaves with them." Men who disdain to curry popular favor, who, if need be, will say to a king or despot, as the Baptist to Herod, Elijah to Ahab, or a Nathan to David, That is thy sin, and Thou art the man. God's call for men in this time-serving and apostate age, is ten thousand times more imperative than the great Lincoln's was when a nation trembled over an abyss and plead for 300,000 patriots to rescue her from impending doom. God wants just now fifty thousand cross-bearers to shame the millions of catering, policy-bound, party-struck, money-led, honor-coveting souls, which adorn (?) state and church. Such moral patriots as God calls to the front are not likely to be Ahab's favorites, or guests of Jezebel. Better a thousand times to keep company with God as Enoch and Elijah, and with God-sent ravens, which bring in due time food to the hungry, from a safer supply train than wicked despots can boast. If we would gravitate upward we must fear God enough to fear man none. Such men as God wants, will not stultify conscience for the sake of a little pottage, and sell their eternal birthright that they may banquet with human beasts, like Ahab and old Belshazzar. It would be no tragedy to be translated as were Enoch and Elijah.

Having answered the questions, what the emergency and who wants men, we proceed to consider the work and the pay. The work is light. Jesus says his "yoke is easy and the burden is light." But it is work and not play and pleasure seeking. A poke would better suit the character of thousands in the churches. But a poke is not used to work in. A yoke is. Jesus has constructed it and it is a perfect fit. He never overtaxes his laborers. He works with them and is always kind and impartial. He requires what every good manager requires, simple industry and implicit obedience, "We then as workers together with him beseech you also that ye receive not the grace of God in vain."

The final question is, What is the pay? Though a real patriot, when he enlists for Christ, will not, perhaps, think of the reward, yet we want to say right here, Christ's laborers are the bravest, most loyal, best armed, best supplied and best paid army known to history. It is the only army never conquered and the only one to which the word conquer is too feeble a term to express its conquests.

Thompson, Pa.

MASONIC HYMN.

FOR OPENING THE DEGREE OF PERFECTION.

(Developed from Webb's Monitor.)

Of priests and kings,
And such old things,
Let old wives preach and prate
Your Hiramite,
With dynamite,
Will blow up church and state.

Throne and crown
Shall tumble down,
And capital must fall,
Your Hiramite,
With dynamite,
Shall soon explode them all.

Then let us sing
Long live the RING!
And blow up all the past;
Your Hiramite
With dynamite,
Shall rule the world at last,

(The lodge is closed with three times three.)

ANON.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP EXCLUDES CHRIST.

It excludes him from its creed, requiring only a belief in a Supreme Being. If there is any reason why an Odd-fellow should believe in God there is an equally strong reason why he should believe in Christ. Any heathen could subscribe to a creed that testifies only to a belief in God, but the Christian does not believe such a testimony sufficient. Such a creed is deistical. It may mean one God to one man and another to another man. It may mean Baal, Adonis, Osiris, Jupiter or Mammon. If a Christian can subscribe to such a creed, which ignores Christ, he could join a Jewish synagogue, where they require a belief in God, but not in Christ, or a Unitarian church, or a Mohammedan church. Yet to hold membership in a Christian church and a Jewish church at the same time would be considered sufficient ground for discipline. It is no better to omit a recognition of Christ than actually to vote against him—in either case he is denied that honor which is due him.

It does not answer this objection to say that the order is not religious and doesn't pretend to teach religion. It does have religious ceremonies, prayers, hymns, burial service, moral homilies, etc. Now if Christ is left out of the order, what kind of religious ceremonies must it have? It cannot be Christian, because Christ is excluded, hence it must be a worship which is not Christian.

It cannot be said that Christ is omitted from the creed and afterwards introduced in the worship. It will be shown hereafter that he is omitted wholly from the lodge. The very object of omitting him from the creed requires that he be wholly excluded. There are many—perhaps the majority—who have never submitted to the Lord Jesus, they do not wish to submit to him; some of them profess not to believe in him. It is to accommodate this class of Odd-fellows that the lodge rejects him. They love the praise (patronage) of men more than of God.

Besides omitting Christ from its creed the lodge omits him from its symbols. The brazen serpent is one of the symbols of the lodge, but in place of allowing its proper significance as a symbol of Christ, it is called a symbol of wisdom! In like manner throughout the whole teaching of the lodge, the very place that Christ ought to occupy he is excluded from. In no place is the candidate told of the Saviour of the world. There is much talk about the teachings of Odd-fellowship and about what the order can do for a man, in elevating him, but not a word about what Jesus Christ can do for him. This is a fatal omission. It is not necessary to pass resolutions against Jesus to show that the lodge is against him. Mohammed, Confucius and Brigham Young never voted to antagonize Jesus, but there is no question that if their teachings prevail Christ would be forgotten. The triumph of Odd-fellowship would not bring the triumph of Christ's kingdom, but the contrary.

Christ is omitted from the prayers of the lodge. The first prayer of the ritual begins, "Thou King, eternal, immortal and invisible! the only wise God our Saviour;" and ends, "This we ask in humble dependence upon, and in most solemn adoration of thy one mysterious and glorious Name." This comes the nearest to a recognition of Christ of any of the prayers, having the expression "our Saviour," but it it is intended to refer to Jesus Christ it would be objectionable to many Odd-fellows. Its very remoteness of allusion shows how constrained it would be to call it a recognition. Beyond this prayer there is no remote allusion to the Saviour. The Sovereign Grand Lodge, meeting in Baltimore in 1882, prescribed two forms of prayer in neither of which is there any recognition of Christ.

The Saviour is omitted from all the "charges" of the order, the very place where the candidate ought to be told of the only way of salvation. Although the candidate is taught some lessons about death, the resurrection, immortality and our duty to God, in no case is the Author of life and immortality and the resurrection brought to his mind. It is tacitly implied that Jesus is not needed. He is a character that figures in sectarian churches, but not in the universal religion of Odd-fellowship.

Christ is omitted from the degree of "Truth." He said, "I am the way, the TRUTH and the life," yet this order teaches the truth without him. In fact the institution does not recognize the Saviour. This constitutes the one great objection to the order.

If the Lord should come he could not enter an Odd-fellows lodge because the lodge considers it more important to have the Lord's enemies than the Lord himself.

O Christian! how can you call yourself the Lord's friend and submit to this indignity. The Jews who first crucified him were unwilling to give him his proper place as religious leader. His enemies ever since have been slighting him. He is wounded in the house of his friends. His honor is taken away, his authority is denied, his name is blasphemed, his office is abolished or given to another—and men, called Christians, submit!

Some men excuse this by saying the order is not religious, yet it does have religious service in which Christ is entitled to a place but receives it not. Others apologize by saying it teaches the principles of of Christianity; but what are the principles without the Saviour himself? It is merely robbery. It is borrowing his teachings to honor an institution that rejects him! Others argue that it does not actually oppose Jesus, but only says nothing about him. "How shall ye escape if ye NEGLECT so great salvation?" But the majority do not trust their own judgment, they rely on the fact that other good men see no harm in the institution, This is "running with the multitude to do evil." When the crowd cries "Hosanna," casting their garments in the way, these men shout the loudest. When the same crowd cries "Crucify him," they echo the cry. They profess in the prayer-meeting to love the Saviour and go to the lodge to swear solemnly to a creed from which he is excluded. No wonder there is leanness in the churches. This great iniquity must be put away.

SHORT SERMON.

TEXT: Why was this waste of the ointment made?

MY BRETHREN:—There is a class of men who seem to be very devoted to the interests of the poor, and especially of poor widows and orphans. They cannot bear to see people lavish their precious gifts upon the church; and think it better to give what one has to give, to the poor, instead of paying for sermons and hymns, etc. Why give one's nice things to bishops, and clergy, and deacons and not to the poor?

My friends, I do not doubt that these men give of their means to the poor. Doubtless after some of them have made hundreds of thousands of dollars out of widows and orphans by one single speculation, they may have given five hundred, more or less, to some widow. It was to this class of men who are so greatly interested for the poor that Judas Iscariot belonged.

My friends; you all know that a class of healthy, practical, pork-eating men called Freemasons have set up a lodge, or place of deposit, a kind of purse, similar to the one of which Judas was the keeper, designed to receive money for helping the poor and needy. These men think that it is not necessary to bestow precious ointment upon the church; but that it is quite enough to put their money into the lodge. They still go to the communion as Judas did; but like him also they go to the popular organizations of the day whose money is given as bribes for betraying Christ. As Judas went to the organizations of the synagogue, the Pretorium, and the high priesthood to offer up the Redeemer of mankind for money, so the Freemason affiliates with secret organizations, Klu-Klux, Fenian, Mormon, Molly Maguire, etc., which are leading Christ to a second crucifixion.

My friends; where will you bestow your money; in sweet-smelling savors upon the church, or will you put it into the lodge, which is set up as the poor man's especial friend, and which is therefore very much better than the church? On the one hand stands the church, as it has always stood, asking for your precious ointment; and on the other hand stands the lodge labelled in large letters, FRIEND OF THE POOR. Now, to which will you give your money?

My brethren; the man who will give money to the poor through the lodge and not through Christ, or in preference to giving it through Christ, is in a dangerous way of making a grave-yard for poor strangers at the expense of Christ's betrayal. LOGIC.

CALMNESS OF TRUTH.

All truth is calm,
Refuge and rock and tower;
The more of truth the more of calm,
Its calmness is its power.

Calmness is truth,
And truth is calmness still;
Truth lifts its forehead to the storm,
Like some eternal hill.

A NEW VOICE AGAINST THE SECRET ORDERS.

We desire to set forth briefly the erroneous attitude of many of the members towards the Christian church.

They stifle the spiritual voices, and painfully endeavor to satisfy the demands of religion by hugging a skeleton of morality, and communing with a soulless benevolence.

They exalt themselves to the grade of the church, but that is not a great height to ascend since they do not recognize, and often deny, the divine origin of the church. To humanize that institution, with its heavenly promises, sealed by the blood of the Son of God, is high iniquity. How dare any one touch the bride of Christ with hands steeped in sin?

They are always on the defensive, vindicating themselves before they are attacked, thus raising the suspicion at least, that they are inwardly aware of deficiencies and would hasten to cover them with senseless platitudes.

It is really amazing that truly rational men will boast that they make a substitution of the order for the church; even more, some claim a superiority for the order. If the church is not infinitely higher than any human society, she does not deserve the consecration of any man's life. We challenge the right to existence of any organization which does not cheerfully and reverently subordinate itself to the Christian church.

There is an awful peril in trifling with God's promises and warnings. There is a tremendous hazard in laughing down the soul's cry and feeding it upon the husks. Therefore, the church or the order, heaven or earth, God or the world, light or darkness, which?—Christian World.

THE SONS OF MALTA.

The Louisville Courier Journal is responsible for the following sketch of that branch of the Masonic system which has the repute of being influential in hatching the rebellion of 1860. The account is credible, for the lodge-drill here described might well form a recreation for plotters of treason and war:

Just a quarter of a century ago a secret society, known as the Sons of Malta, sprang suddenly into existence in the city of New Orleans. The original object of the organization was the capture of Cuba, and many prominent military men of the South were the leading spirits in the movement. For reasons which the writer is not at liberty to divulge the filibustering plans of the order were adruptly squelched, and soon thereafter a well-known newspaper man, who had been initiated, conceived the idea of making "some fun for the boys." The whole business of initiation, etc., was transformed into a series of the most stupendous sells, practical jokes, and outrageously comical proceedings ever dreamed of. The order spread rapidly all over the Union. It was generally believed by the outside public that the Sons of Malta was a benevolent society, and to foster this belief frequent lengthy notices of charitable deeds performed by the order were published in the newspapers all over the land. Meetings were held weekly, and there was so much solid fun to be enjoyed that nothing short of a death in the family would deter a member from attending; therefore in many places the membership was so great that the utmost difficulty was experienced in obtaining lodge-rooms of sufficient capacity.

Candidates for initiation were ushered into the hall where those who were already members were arranged in rows, each covered from head to foot with a white or black gown, in which was cut small holes for the eyes and mouth. With this garment on the identity of the wearer was perfectly concealed and the candidates who were initiated at one time did not know whether they were in the hands of friends or strangers.

To each candidate the "master of ceremonies," in a most impressive and pleasing manner, stated the objects of the order, and told how the brotherhood came together with one aim and one understanding. "We are bound together," he said, "by the ties of love, confidence and charity for one another, strengthened and solidified by the cement of confession. We open up the secrets of our hearts in the hearing and presence of each other. We are all sinful creatures and confession is good for the soul. Our good deeds speak for themselves and our bad deeds are recorded, and in due time these records are burned and the ashes are all that remain of a dead and forgotten past."

Then the candidate was asked if he was willing to leave the sinful world behind, and enter upon the new life? An affirmative answer, and the initiation began. He was immediately blindfolded, led to a step-ladder, and told to ascend and seat himself on the top stair with arms folded. This was the position each had to occupy while undergoing the ordeal of a "confession" of his misdeeds. He would be led along by adroit questioning until he made what was regarded as a "clean breast" of his moral shortcomings. When a particularly rich or unexpected admission was pumped out of him, a deep, sepulchral voice solemnly exclaimed:

"Re-c-o-r-d it!"

And immediately a heavy blow was struck upon a big drum to drown the irrepressible laughter.

If a candidate gave evidence of a desire to conceal anything he was given to understand that the inner secrets of his soul were known to the order, and to hesitate in giving them would be an unpardonable crime in the eyes of the brotherhood. This would suffice for many, but the majority would of course hold out and refuse to answer some indelicate question, liable to lead into a channel that might involve him in a disagreeable confession. And all through this was exactly what was aimed at.

In such cases an intimate friend of the candidate would pass up to the master of ceremonies on a slip of paper a point of two in some questionable transaction of the applicant's life, and this would prove the key to unlock the secret recesses of his heart. Then would the master say, in a tone of rebuke:

"The record of the order show that upon such a day, in such a year, while you were in the city of Cincinnati you did thus and so." Then in a tone mildly expostulatory he continued:

"My friend—would I could call you brother—as I have said before, all your misdeeds are known to the order to which you are seeking admission. While crossing the portals which separate our brotherhood from a wicked and siuful world, and while about entering upon a new life, and breathing a purer atmosphere, you have ungratefully tried to deceive us. For this you are to be punished and thrust back into the wickedness you are so loath to leave behind.

"Sir Knight, summon the council of ten and take the recreant before that tribunal for punishment."

Then to the candidate, in a saddened tone of voice:

"Sir, there is but one way in which you can redeem yourself in the eyes of the brotherhood—make a full and complete confession."

The feeling that their secrets might actually be in possession of the brotherhood, and an indefinable dread of what that council of ten might do in the way of punishment, invariably unlocked the mouth, and some of the most sedate citizens—men of good character and standing—were forced to own up to moral transgressions they would not care to have appear in print.

The candidate was then asked if he could swim. If he answered in the affirmative the reply was: "Let us see you." If in the negative the answer was: "We will teach you." Still blindfolded, he was marched to a far corner of the room, where a stream of water from a faucet kept up the delusion of a prospective bath, and commencing to disrobe for the plunge. Four strong brothers then seize him, and with a toss placed him with his stomach resting on the top of a high stool and told him to "strike out." The delusion was so great that the poor victim would kick and paw the air, and make the most ridiculous exertions imaginable.

Although it was a dry bath, the new-fledged brother had to be put through the drying machine This was a high, narrow box—just high enough and wide enough for a man to stand upright in. When he was in three slats were inserted to keep him in position while he was going through the drying process. The box was hung on pivots between two upright bars, and had attached to the side a crank, by which it could be readily and quite rapidly revolved. And this was only one of the little trials which the ambitious seeker after the mysteries of Malta had to undergo. He was whirled round and round perpendicularly, head over heels and heels over head, first quite slow and then with gradually increasing speed, until the breath of the human propeller gave out. The frightened fellow was then removed to an easy chair to take a rest, while further questions were propounded to him, and the sonorous "Re-c-o-r-d it!" resounded through the hall after each of his answers. He was then told to prepare for the "rough and rugged road." He was placed on all fours, and, by prodding from the rear, forced to crawl through a long iron boiler, on which the men were hammering; thence up a rough incline to the top of a pedestal twelve or fifteen feet high, from which he was shoved into a large blanket made of sail-cloth, with hand-poles for ten men on a side. Then he was sent flying to the ceiling. Down he would come and up he would go at the rate of thirty times in sixty seconds, and such a shaking up as the poor fellow experienced cannot be realized by those who have not been similarly favored.

And thus the "initiation" continued until the resources of the lodge were exhausted; one grand sell followed another in rapid succession, each one more stupendous than the one preceding. Finally, as a grand wind-up, the candidate was informed that in view of the fact that he had suffered so many indignities and passed through such a trying ordeal, the lodge had decided to confer upon him the honorary title of G. R. J. A.—judge, or colonel, or general so-and-so having resigned the position in his favor.

With a lengthy and florid speech from the master of ceremonies, and a deal of adulation and mock tokens of respect from the now unmasked members of the order, the candidate was presented with his credentials, which it was made obligatory upon him should be immediately opened and examined. Hastily the "great seal" of the order would be broken, the certificate taken from the envelope and opened, when the victim would discover the picture of a jackass in bold relief, with various accoutrements and accomplishments, and would pocket his credentials and his chagrin amid the roar of the frolicksome gang that surround him.

This expose could be greatly extended, but enough has been given to let those in Louisville, who were members of the "noble order," know that one of the G. R. J. A.'s has been "given away" their cussedness.

JOSEPH COOK'S LATE UTTERANCE UPON SECRET SOCIETIES.

EDITORS CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—Joseph Cook, a modern savan in orthodox religion and science, and the greatest living opponent of infidelity and atheism, has recently added to his immense stores of knowledge by a journey of observation to different nationalities around the globe. The Congregational Club of Chicago, numbering one hundred and eighty members, recently invited Mr. Cook to a collation in his honor, made at the palatial Palmer House in Chicago. The members of the Club and their invited guests, amounting to over four hundred persons, sat down to the finely furnished tables. After supper, Prof. Fisk of the Club arose, and standing upon a dias prepared for the occasion, introduced Mr. Cook, who delivered a most telling address upon the question, "How shall American cities be governed without elevating to places of power the scoundrel classes?" It had been the misfortune of Chicago at the last two annual elections to behave itself in such a way as to give occasion for starting the foregoing question. It had been announced by Prof. Fisk that Mr. Cook would answer any questions written and sent up to him, and that at the close of his address he would turn his attention to his interviewers. Many questions were asked him. He answered them in a very direct manner. Among other questions upon the subject of government was the following:

"Do not the members of secret combinations who have sworn to mutual aid and protection, and who are interested in elevating to posts of trust and power their own membership, threaten the well being of city, State and national governments?"

Mr. Cook answered in a very emphatic manner substantially as follows:

"I have no sympathy with secret societies. In despotic governments there may be some reasons for such societies, for the laudable purposes of mutual protection against tyranny and oppression. But in a free government like our own, they have scarce an excuse for existence. I would not be as ultra as some. I would not say that all who belong are bad men, but it were better that even good men be not associated in such a manner. It is not fruitful of that broad and generous spirit of brotherhood which should exist between the members of community. I do abhor the selfish, clannish spirit of secret societies." (Applause.)

It will be observed that Mr. Cook was asked a question about "secret combinations," and began his answer at once by expressing his disapprobation of "secret societies." By this it may be inferred that he has his eyes open to the real question, and not simply to trades-unions—one of its phases. The spirit of the meeting was also expressed by not a little clapping of hands at the conclusion of his remarks.

It is known to the reading public that Joseph Cook is the most widely read and most highly honored speaker of the English speaking tongue of the present generation, and his themes are chosen from the most vital topics of religion and civil government. He speaks much for the disenthrallment of the human mind from error, and for elevation of the masses. His Monday lectures before crowded audiences in Tremont Temple, Boston, are circulated wherever the English language is spoken, and many of them are translated into the provincial tongues of Europe. Well, what of it? you may ask. Just this. Mr. Cook is no fanatic. He does not speak from associating with "fanatics." He is no "hobby rider." He would not get upon one if he had an opportunity. He speaks from his own unprejudiced studies upon the subject. He has no financial or denominational ends to serve. He has no friends to please as a reason for saying that he disapproves of secret societies, and that he abhors their selfish and clannish spirit. If Mr. Cook, in his unbiased wisdom has this opinion, as he does, may it not be well for other Americans to look into the same subject, without fear or favor, and candidly canvass the grounds for and against these societies? An honest and faithful inquiry after truth will hurt nobody. Upon it much depends for two worlds.

L. N. STRATTON.

Wheaton Theological Seminary, May 9th, 1883.

The beginning of a daily edition on the Sabbath by the Inter Ocean has greatly widened the distance between press and pulpit. That paper some three years ago took a vote of its subscribers upon a Sunday sheet, and the result was an indefinite postponement, since a heavy loss would surely follow of conscientious readers, who preferred that paper for the only reason that it respected the Sabbath. The first number of its Sunday sheet is a disgrace to journalism, a mixture of vulgarity and immorality. Truly pious men, whether in the pulpit or out of it, could have but few points of fellowship with the managers who are responsible for such violation of common decency and the laws of God.

General Grant says that, when in China, he was shown a piece of land which had been under cultivation every year for five thousand years without deterioration of the fertility of the soil.

AMERICAN POLITICS.

NOMINATIONS FOR 1884.

For President
JONATHAN BLANCHARD
OF ILLINOIS.

For Vice President,
JOHN A. CONANT,
OF CONNECTICUT.

PLATFORM.

We hold: 1. That ours is a Christian and not a heathen nation, and that the God of the Christian Scriptures is the author of civil government.

2. That God requires and man needs a Sabbath.

3. That the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is the true policy on the temperance question.

4. That the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

5. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by articles 13th, 14th and 15th of our amended Constitution should be preserved inviolate.

6. That arbitration of differences with nations is the most direct and sure method of securing and perpetuating a permanent peace.

7. That to cultivate the intellect without improving the morals of men, is to make mere adepts and experts; therefore, the Bible should be associated with books of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

8. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

9. That the government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

10. That maintenance of the public credit, protection to all loyal citizens, and justice to Indians are essential to the honor and safety of our nation.

11. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice-president of the United States.

TO AMERICAN VOTERS.

TWO VASTLY IMPORTANT COMMUNICATIONS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 16th, 1883.

President Blanchard,

MY DEAR SIR:—I am just in receipt of your letter of April 14th, in which you speak of the purpose and desire of friends connected with the American Party to concentrate their votes in 1884 upon some suitable candidate representing their principles, and asking if my name might be used, etc.

This is to say that if there be unity of action and purpose in that direction, and the party decide in convention that such a course is the wisest and best, I shall not feel myself at liberty to refuse the use of my name.

Presuming, however, that other and better counsels will prevail, I content myself by subscribing yours very cordially,

S. C. POMEROY.

LETTER OF WITHDRAWAL.

I am thankful to the Party for nominating me, and am neither insensible of the honor nor indifferent to it. But before I was nominated I had written General Neal Dow and Governor St. John, both of whom in very friendly letters declined the nomination. We failed to receive Senator Pomeroy's answer to our nomination of him as Vice President, and I did not write him. Finding here that he wrote accepting that nomination, which letter never reached us, I at once wrote him the note to which the above is his prompt reply. Therefore, thanking the American Party for my nomination at Galesburg, and its confirmation and endorsement in several States since, I hereby respectfully and positively withdraw my name from the canvass, to take effect from and after the next national conventional of the American Party. My reasons for this peremptory withdrawal are found in the sketch I have written of Senator Pomeroy. Till our next convention my name stands. And now let us move heaven and earth. The chances are that Pomeroy may be elected in 1884. May God grant it. Yours in Christ,

J. BLANCHARD.

POLITICAL CURIOSITIES EXPLAINED.

One more entry to make against unveracious Washington reporters. The items quoted last week respecting the President hunt in Washington appeared in similar form in other papers than the Inter Ocean. Secretary Stoddard called with Mr. Pomeroy upon ex-Senator Robert Bruce, of Mississippi. They were cordially received. Mr. Bruce is a colored man, but has never been connected with any secret society as he informed his visitors. They conversed freely with him respecting the origin, principles, objects and prospects of our reform, especially in its political phase.

Mr. Bruce listened attentively and remarked, "I have listened with the deepest interest to what you have said."

Then followed a somewhat promiscuous conference, writes Bro. Stoddard, in reference to the condition of politics in the South, etc. When asked to identify himself with the American Party Mr. Bruce replied, "I am not ready to leave the Republican party," and referred us to Mr. Douglass, saying, "he is an older man and has had more experience than I." Bro. Stoddard continues:

"How the 'innocent' reporters obtained the information which lead them to commit such blunder as to say that we were hunting Presidential candidates and proposing to put men in nomination on sight is not known to me. Representatives of the press have called on me, but to none of them have I stated or intimated anything of the kind. There is evidently considerable trepidation in the camp and a desire to learn all possible about what is to be done in this building; whether the American Party is going to start an organ in this city, etc., etc., but I can of course not give any information that I do not myself possess."

A LESSON IN VOTING.

Degraded as are the Indians of New Mexico, even the best of them, we are not so much more civilized that we may not learn wisdom from some of their customs. Miss Willard, the temperance worker, now traveling in the far West, writes back commending the elections of the Pueblos thus:

They have a very simple form of election among the Pueblos, one that might with propriety be recommended to the politicians of Gotham. It is this: The mayor of the city is chosen once a year. He cannot have a second term.

On the morning of election day the outgoing mayor nominates two candidates for the succession. One of these goes to one end of the field, the other takes his station opposite. Every man (why not every woman, too, pray tell?) goes to the candidate of his choice and literally "stands up for him." Rapidly the lines lengthen on either side. The old men of the tribe count the number in each and thus the election is absolutely without fraud and, best of all, they can dispense with caucuses!

QUESTIONS IN MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

Mohammedans call Christians by the contemptuous term of "Christian dogs;" Freemasons call them simply dogs, or "cowans," and the Mormons call them "gentiles." All three of these sects—Mohammedan, Masonic and Mormon, are deliberate, determined, treasonable conspiracies against the majesty of the Lord of the Christians. Under these circumstances four men, to wit, a Christian, a Mohammedan, a Freemason, and a Mormon are up for office.

Now the question is:

First. Has a real, true Christian the moral right to vote for any one of the last three candidates named?

Second. If the Christian really believes in his heart that "Jesus is king," does he not commit an act of moral treason against the king by voting for a Mohammedan, a Freemason, or a Mormon?

Third. Is it morally possible that a Christian people can be blessed under the rule of a President elected by Freemasons?

Fourth. As three-fourths of our Presidents, at least, for the last thirty years have been members of the lodge, and as all of them have been under the influence and control of the lodge, is it not about time for a moral people to take that "sober second thought which is always right?"

COMPROMISE.—The history of our country is against the policy of compromise. The attempt to harness Slavery and Freedom side by side to the chariot of State, the Missouri Compromise which arranged that south of 36 degrees and 30 minutes should be legal property, while all territory north of that imaginary line should be free—what were these, in the light of subsequent history, but monuments of human folly? Abraham Lincoln spoke with better wisdom when, in his debate with Douglass, he said: "This country cannot endure permanently half slave and half free. It must become all one thing, or all the other."

Politicians are mistaken when they imagine that they shape the issues for the people. It is the people, each one thinking and acting for himself, who determine what issues must be taken up and how they shall be decided. Politicians are but driftwood, borne on the surface, and indicate the direction of the current. The current itself is created by the power of truth, and true statesmanship discerns and falls in with these deeper forces working in the hearts of the masses. They only are wise whose eyes are ever upon the rising issues, recognizing the advice of Napoleon, who is reported to have said: "March in advance of the ideas of your time and they will follow and support you; march behind them and they will drag you after them; march against them and they will crush you to the earth."—Christian Statesman.

NEW ENGLAND.

THE NEW ENGLAND BOARD of the National Christian Association has its headquarters at No. 8 Portland St., Worcester, Mass. A full supply of books and tracts constantly on hand. Orders promptly filled. Correspondence solicited.

E. D. BAILEY N. E. Sec'y.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Tanner, Jr., have returned from the South and taken up their abode at Nashua, N. H., No. 132 West Pearl Street, where they will reside for the present. Friends will regret to learn that brother Tanner's health is not improving and that he is now barely able to keep around a little.

The new M. E. pastor of brother Gilbert's church at Birmingham, Conn., is a Knight Templar. This is sad news.

We hear of another seceding secretist in N. H., who is likely to be a valuable accession to the testifying forces of that State.

Here is a letter from a Rhode Island gentleman, which will be read with interest: "When brother Spaulding was here he showed me some papers and advertisements of which I knew nothing before. I have been deeply interested in the subject since, especially in a book claiming to expose the Temple of Honor, of which I have been a member, having joined —— lodge about ten years ago, and I do declare that as far as I have seen of it it is correct in every particular. I consider their oaths illegal, null and void, and would consider myself a traitor to my Redeemer if I withheld from the world around me the knowledge of the profane use of sacred things, the unauthorized assumption of their chiefs, the lying promises and assertions of their ritual, the blindfolding of candidates, and divesting of clothing, and the sham lightning and mock thunder practiced at the initiation. This is not exaggeration, it is the truth." This testimony comes from a reliable Christian brother who evidently means to be no drone in the hive of reformers.

Arrangements are progressing for a series of lectures at Westerley, R. I., this month.

Gen'l. J. W. Phelps has consented to give an address at the Vermont State Convention. This will be interesting news to all friends of the cause. Probably no man in the State is more familiar with the history of the Anti-masonic movement of fifty years ago and with the political movement and the legislative enactments, than General Phelps.

Mrs. L. R. De Wolf has consented to prepare a paper for the Vermont Convention to interest the women in the reform. It is evident the meeting must be one of unusual interest.

Mr. Spaulding has again returned with a favorable report of his work. He has found some ministers favorable to the reform. A Methodist minister told him that since farmers commenced to raise tobacco in the Connecticut Valley the membership of the M. E. church had fallen off one-third and he attributes it to the demoralizing effects of that traffic.

O. C. Bailey preached in the Congregational church a Dorset, Vt., one week ago, and last Friday he was expecting to lecture in Jamaica. A card from him speaks encouragingly of the prospect. He writes of a Masonic funeral as follows: "I attended a Masonic funeral in Manchester the other day. The deceased seemed to have been a high Mason and his brothers of the secret-tie obtained permission to show their white aprons to the public and boast of the false glories of Masonry. The Masonic minister read from the Masonic bible, 'From time immemorial it has been the custom of the order,' etc., etc. Of course men now-a-days are not to blame for performing such blasphemous ceremonies if they have been performed by men since that remote period!"

In the same letter is given this item about temperance: "In one town when the people were trying to stop the sale of intoxicating liquors, an officer of the law, a Mason, and a professedly temperance man, all at once found that his other business was so important that he could not find time to attend to the case brought against a brother Mason, and the case fell through. That proves the truth of the Masonic claim that 'you seldom see a Mason brought to trial!' * * * We need to press this work now because the generation that gives strength to our cause is fast passing away. I am much encouraged in the work."

HALF-WAY TEMPERANCE.

WORCESTER, Mass., May 7th, 1883.

Last evening it was my privilege to address the Reform Club of this city. I have been invited to speak there several times, but only now have I been able to do so. This Club (I am told) was organized when Dr. Reynolds brought his crusade to this city. Among the members are some excellent men, but if the reports of the daily papers are correct many of these reformers need to be reformed. A single virtue cannot thrive greatly without the companionship of other virtues, and the attempt to plant temperance in a life which issues from a corrupt heart must result in a failure.

I have never been favorably impressed with the frequent recurrence of dramatic entertainments and dances for the "benefit" of temperance, yet such things have been frequently advertised in this city. It would not be becoming to criticise honest efforts with unseemly language, but it does seem as if the churches should do more for temperance and leave less occasion for lovers of the reform, whose moral sentiments are otherwise low, to claim that they have to abandon religion in order to preach temperance. The president of this society said at the close of the meeting, "We try to make men temperate, and then we leave it to you gentlemen (meaning the clergymen) to convert them."

The audience at this meeting was good, and gave good attention while I claimed for Christ the distinction of being the wisest, most successful and most philosophical of reformers, and that he based his reforms on nothing less than a complete, radical transformation of the whole man, beginning with the regeneration of the heart and ending with perfect uprightness of life. It does not seem to me that Christians can claim less than this, or be satisfied with pretended reforms which ignore the Divine Reformer.

I am rejoiced to announce that Gen. Phelps is expecting to address the Vermont State Convention, that Mrs. DeWolf will write a paper, Rev. Messrs. Laird and Faris have already been asked to prepare addresses, and Rev. W. H. Randall is to be invited. We have also a partial promise from another lady besides Mrs. DeWolf, of a paper. We must rely much upon the Wesleyans and the Reformed Presbyterians of the State to give character to the convention. These churches have a footing in the State, and can, and doubtless will, give great aid to the cause. But there are others in various parts of the State who ought to go. In such a community as the one at Green River, where there are many friends residing near each other, if they cannot all go they could at least club together and send one or more of their number. Brethren Potter, Gates and DeWolf, will you not see to it that your part of the country is represented? Then there are those sturdy brethren at Jamaica, do not fail to have at least one from your town present at the meeting. There is always some one to go if others will help in the expenses. Then there is Brandon, from whence come Messrs. Conant and Whittemore; perhaps these brethren will not only come themselves but furnish the means for sending their worthy pastor. Every man and woman in the State who has any care for the reform should expect to share in this first endeavor to hold a State meeting. But especially should friends residing in the section of the State where the convention meets, plan to come in force and bring their neighbors. Bring the halting and doubting ones, bring all classes and let there be a general and hearty rally.

After working a week in the southeastern part of the State, Bro. O. C. Bailey will go northward again to work in the vicinity of Montpelier and see that everything is in readiness. A card from Elder Isaac Jackson, of Maine, informs us that he and his wife are going to Vermont, and will attend the convention.

LITERARY.

The Highways of Literature is one of the books which, after reading, one wishes to put into the hand of all young persons just beginning their studious habits; and it is none the less valuable for the direction of parents in opening the gates to the broad fields of literature to their children. The author, David Pryde, head master of the Edinburgh Ladies' College, undertakes to lay down rules by which the reader may both select for himself the best books, and also study them in such a way that they will be of highest use in the duties of every-day life. Many books have been written on the selection of books for reading or for a library, but few will excel this for practical value, entertaining style and critical analysis of the topics discussed in the different chapters on Fiction, Biography, History, Poetry, The Drama, Oratory and Mental Philosophy. Published by John B. Alden, New York. Price, paper, 10 cents; cloth, 30 cents.

The excellent Missionary Review retains its place at the head of the list of missionary publications in respect to general information from all the societies. As a faithful and independent critit of the methods of conducting missionary work economically and successfully, it deserves reading in every Christian household, for all such are interested in missions. The May-June number has a second article on the great Decennial Conference in India. The differences between the missionaries of the American Board and the native pastors and churches of Armenia are presented at some length and some facts respecting the management of missionary affairs by Dr. Anderson are incidentally mentioned which should have profound attention from the churches. The New York Independent has also been doing good service in this matter of late. Of no less interest is an article on the relations of Mission Boards and local presbyteries and the advantages of giving the latter large control of the missionary work in their bounds. The review of the foreign missionary societies is continued showing by a tabulated statement the work of each; the Disciples church, the various Methodist churches, including Wesleyans and Free Methodists, and Bible Christians of Canada being represented.

Joseph Nimmo, Jr., Chief of the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, is preparing for the June number of the North American Review, an article on the Manufacturing Interests of the United States.

Mr. James Bryce, M. P., in his essay on "England and Ireland," in the forthcoming Century, mentions, among other interesting facts, that the so-called "National" party in Ireland, while it may seem to represent the nation, yet really can claim less than half the Irish members of Parliament. Ireland has in that body one hundred and four members, of whom about forty are Nationalists. Of the remaining sixty-four, about twenty-seven are Tories, nine Ulster Liberal Protestants, and the rest nominally Home Rulers and for the most part Roman Catholics, but practically (with a few exceptions) supporters of the present Liberal Government, and therefore regarded as foes by the Nationalists themselves. These sixty-four represent technically more than half the country; substantially, no doubt, they represent less; but, at the lowest computation, more than a million Irishmen are opposed to the Nationalist programme—and a minority like this, representing as it does most of the property and education of the island, cannot be ignored by the English Government.

REFORM NEWS.

THE NEBRASKA CONVENTION.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The Nebraska State Christian Association met at the United Brethren church in Marquette, Hamilton county, May 9th, at 2:30 P. M. It was called to order by the president Rev. S. Austin, and after a season of devotional exercises, was addressed at some length by the presiding officer. On motion committees were then chosen on enrollment, on resolutions, on finance, and State agency, on permanent organization and on religious exercises, after which they adjourned to meet at 7 P. M.

In the evening the committee on organization reported a constitution and by-laws and the following officers were elected:

Pres. Elder S. Austin; Vice presidents, J. M. Snyder, S. E. Lloyd and J. McCleary; Secretaries, W. S. Spooner and E. L. Conoyer; Treasurer, J. C. Fye; Executive Committee: E. D. Graham, J. T. Squires and J. Smith.

The meeting was then addressed by Elder E. P. Mead and the president.

The convention met at 8:30 on the 10th and was opened with prayer, after which it was voted to employ a State agent for at least three months, and the N. C. A. was asked to aid in the work in the State. A subscription was taken for State work.

The following resolutions were then taken up, discussed and adopted.

WHEREAS, the prevalence of Christianity is essential to morality, civilization and good government; and

WHEREAS, we believe that Freemasonry and kindred societies are subversive of the Christian religion and destructive to civil equality; therefore,

Resolved, 1. That we earnestly invite all citizens and especially all Christians, to investigate the nature and tendency of these institutions and to unite with us in seeking their overthrow.

2. That secret military organizations, like Knight Templars and the Grand Army of the Republic, are wholly needless in time of peace and are a standing menace to free governments.

3. That the secret trades unions have denied to the people the right to labor except with their consent; have enforced idleness, promoted poverty, stimulated and protected murders and other crimes, and therefore ought to be suppressed by law.

4. That we commend the National Christian Association and the Christian Cynosure, and we especially commend the work they have recently inaugurated in the city of Washington, D. C.

5. That we approve the platform and nominations of the American party and urge a thorough political organization against the lodge.

The attendence was small, but earnest and harmonious. The report closes at 12 M. of the 10th.

LETTER FROM MISSISSIPPI.

COLUMBUS, Miss., May 4, 1883.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I took recently a jaunt into Chickasaw and Monroe counties. I found the people ready to hear, talk and read on the subject of secretism. I found more of them opposed to it than I expected, and better posted on the Anti-masonic work. I met an Anti-mason who told me that he had once had in possession a copy of Morgan's Exposition of Masonry, and had loaned it out, and it met the usual fate of expositions; it returned no more. I passed through the towns and villages of Aberdeen, West Point, Libbe, Muldon, Artesia, and Prairie Station, and distributed reform tracts, and also on the train. No one refused them. I found some who had read anti-secret literature, distributed by some person from Okalona.

I passed through a very fine, fertile prairie region

swarming with colored people. Indeed, this part of the country is mostly peopled with freedmen. As I went from Aberdeen to Houston through the country roads I saw crowds of colored children and youths going to school. I found a good many that could read easy reading, and two that could read the Bible. They have a good many schools mostly taught by their own people. At some places I found that strong drink was doing them great injury. At Prairie Station there were two liquor shops and one store.

The terrible cyclone which visited south, east and central Mississippi in which there was great destruction and many lives lost, did not come to Columbus. I have not been in any of its tracks except near Caledonia. Two men were killed: Jack Stephenson (white), and Sam Blevins (colored); others were hurt. Caledonia was greatly injured, but the country west of it much more so. The scene of ruin is beyond all description. Gin-houses, cribs, stables, barns, and many dwelling houses lying in shapeless masses with timbers scattered around; whole farms with prostrate fences and the cattle grazing on the crops; trees torn up by the roots lying piled up in every direction; roads completely blockaded; crushed animals, shattered furniture, strown bricks, and tattered bed-clothing mixed and mingled together.

"After the wind" may the Lord send the "still small voice" of his Spirit into every heart. E. TAPLEY.

TRUTH CONQUERING STILL IN KANSAS.

SABETHA, Kans.

EDITOR CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE:—I can again report progress in Nemeha and Brown counties on the secret order question. Brothers Dissette, Coleman and myself have given a great many lectures all over this part of Kansas in the last three or four months. We have been listened to with greatest attention. We first visited the schoolhouses all over the country and then wound up in the city of Sabetha. We had here three appointments and had many Masons, Odd-fellows and Grand Army men to hear us. Brother Dissette, being a seceding Master Mason, was received as good authority. The secret fraternity kept their jewels manfully. We had the best of order and attention. Dissette spoke plainly and exposed the whole workings of secret orders in the most able and forcible manner. The common people heard us gladly also; but the ministers did not appear at one of our meetings, thinking to throw cold water on us by non-attendance; but, thank God, the day is fast going by when men of good common sense can be hoodwinked and cable-towed by an unfaithful, money-loving, popularity-seeking ministry. We have seven professed ministers of Jesus in this city; not one of them appeared on the scene.

At our last meeting the Masons themselves helped us to elect our chairman from one of their number, who is both a Mason and Odd-fellow. He filled the chair with honor to himself and the audience. Another omen of progress is that our city paper, the Nemeha County Republican will publish our communications; it has published twice for us. In our lectures we tried to show the power of the lodge in our courts; in our legislatures and Congress; in our churches, presbyteries, synods, conferences; and that the lodge stands under the whisky ring and holds and bolsters it up all over this nation; in short, it is the kingdom of the devil in battle array against the kingdom of Christ to try to overthrow the two great systems God has ordained for the well-being of the human race, namely, civil and religious government. But, thank God, this man of sin that has been hid away in the rubbish of the lodge is now coming to the light and is being revealed. And now, dear friends, let us work on and pray on, trusting in the God of battles till victory shall be given to Christ and his redeemed church. JOHN THOMPSON.

ONE GRIP MORE.—A New Hampshire boy initiated into the lodge through the Know nothing dodge twenty-five years ago, might have thought himself on the way to leave his old Democratic cronies and become a "Black Republican." The Masonic Democrats of New Hampshire have not got over that trick yet.

But if the initiated boy should have gone to the South, he would have found that all the slave-holders had all his grips, and one grip more besides, which he knew nothing about. Finding to be a Northern Mason and a Black Republican, they might hound him down, insult or kill him just as if he were a mere cowan like any ordinary

ANTI-MASON.

The Roman Catholic church has made a point of asserting that its influence has been steadily in favor of sustaining the sanctity of the marriage relation, declaring at the same time that Protestantism has weakened the bond, to which the New York Observer replies: "The Roman Catholic church by denying the right of marriage to its clergy has taught designedly that the unmarried state is more conductive to holy living than the married; it has exalted the sanctity of celibacy; and by its unscriptural doctrine of 'immaculate conception,' it has sought to taint the marriage state with the imputation of sin. There is no church, society, or government on earth that has so flagrantly, persistently and universally dishonored marriage as the Church of Rome."

W. S. Holland, M. D., of the Irrepressible Conflict, proposes that a premium be offered for the best job turned out by the liquor traffickers, at our county fairs, of Missouri, the coming autumn, in order that justice may be done this legitimate business. He proposes a $50 prize for the most complete drunkard in any county, $30 to be given for the best five years' job, and $10 for the best work of one year. A sadder spectacle could hardly be presented.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A GREAT TESTIMONY.

Occasionally one contributes a testimony to the murder of Morgan, by quoting the admission of the fact by some Mason, with or without a name. The truth is, there were more Masons in New York in 1830 and 1832 who were willing to admit the murder than there were to deny it, and to quote their admissions now seems quite superfluous. But as it is in order thus to quote, allow me to adduce the name of Col. Wm. L. Stone, editor of the N. Y. Spectator, and author of the Life of Brant. He was a Royal Arch Mason, and never formally renounced Masonry, but he was also a scholar and a man of candor. He had published in the Spectator one of the myriad reports set afloat by Masons as to the whereabouts of Morgan—the one which said that he had been offered, and actually handed over, to Brant, the young chief of the Mohawk nation. This called forth a quick and spirited letter of denial from Brant, who declared that no such offer had ever been made to him, and that he knew nothing of the fate of the "unhappy man." Stone, in his Life, quotes this letter, and prefaces it with some remarks about "that deep and fearful conspiracy in the western part of New York, which resulted in the murder of William Morgan by a small body of over-zealous Freemasons." Again, referring to the various methods proposed for the disposal of their prisoner, he says: "But every device for the banishment of Morgan failed, and he was buried at the solemn hour of midnight in the rocky caverns of Niagara." Col. Stone also refers to the letter as having been called out by the suggestion that he (Brant) might have been connected with what he terms "that murderous transaction." Such admissions by adhering Masons, were the most common thing in the world at the period referred to. What makes it pertinent to quote them now, I suppose, is the fact that the "hoodwink" has been drawn over the heads of a young generation of Masons, who deny, or pretend not to know of, the great crime of their fathers. G. W. H.

THE POWER OF PRAYER.

During the last two years I have written several articles for the Cynosure, setting forth as best I could the indispensible necessity of the evangelical prayer of agreement to the vigorous progress of the reform work; that the work was God's work; that if it was ever done he must do it, and that he will be enquired of by his people to do these things for them: that prayer is a mighty instrument divinely designed and constructed and put into the hands of Christians, and they required to use it according to divine directions; that when thus used it never did fail. Jesus used it; all the holy on earth have used it; it was never known to fail.

Brethren and sisters, I am greatly encouraged. This truth seems to be in the front of the reform. Many ask for prayers to be offered to God to help them in their struggles in putting forward the work. They ask for prayers for the agents, for the institutions, for the publications, and on all efforts to forward this good cause.

They not only call for prayers, but they say in the great majority of articles that they are praying. Oh! how my heart has been cheered to hear from all quarters. I pray God for this and that, and the other person, agent, institution, publication, or meeting. There seems to be a settled habit of the prayer of agreement all through the ranks of earnest Christians all over the land wherever the friends of the reform are found. O how I am strengthened when I kneel in prayer every day and some times many times a day, to know that hundreds of Christians in almost every State and country are agreeing with me as touching the same things. What a power it gives to each of us to know that the spirit of the Lord is leading us into the spirit of agreement! It is a great encouragement that these prayers are not only offered, but they are answered. What wonderful things have been done! They seem marvels, and they are marvels. None but God could bring them to pass. God works in us and through us while we pray, and it is because prayer is a mighty instrumentality. It is a great thing to use it rightly. It is no child's play, no holiday work—none but the spirit of God can inspire it. Our power and wisdom is nothing; our worthiness is filthy rags.

The deepest humility becomes us, and only while we are humble and keep humble can we use this divinely constructed and divinely appointed instrumentality; but when thus used God will respond to it. He has done it. He is now doing it; and this is the only method he will use until this work is done. We need not have a special day appointed to secure the prayer of agreement. Every day should be used for it, and I am wonderfully encouraged to think it is becoming a settled habit that can only be appealed to to call it forth. Brethren, the brightest graces may fail; constant watchfulness and daily exhortations are needed. Receive this from me for this purpose and in this spirit, and may we see wonders of grace accomplished. AN OLD PILGRIM.

TRUE TO ITSELF.

The Freemasons who sentenced Morgan to death, and executed the sentence, heard only one side of the case, and that was their own side. If the case had been brought before an honest jury, Morgan would have been set at liberty, and his accusers would have been prosecuted for a conspiracy to take life. A secret institution that swears men to tear out tongues, rip open bowels, cut off heads, etc., is necessarily a conspiracy against life.

The Masonic lodge is always true to itself, and false to everything else. Its members are impelled by the same incentives to wrong and injustice that they ever were. Take for instance the recent instance where the governor of Massachusetts, who holds the high Masonic rank of Grand Sovereign Inspector General, dismissed an officer of a State's prison on charges from the convicts, without stopping to listen to the other side of the case. This Masonic governor was animated by the same arrogant spirit that actuated the murderers of Morgan; only his act was not so criminal as theirs. He had been secretly elected by the lodge in the face of a dominant open party, and, emboldened by lodge-support, he boldly proceeded to execute measures in lodge fashion, which is in direct opposition to the laws of the land. He obeyed the lodge and not the law. NEW ENGLANDER.

THE LODGE AND INTEMPERANCE.

Put this fact by the side of Elder Callender's fact to be remembered. During these fifteen years since Elder Callender wrote his essay on secret societies, I have known four Baptist ministers who have disgraced their high profession by too free a use of intoxicating drinks. Singularly enough they were all Masons and a part of them at least were Odd-fellows. As it happens these are the only cases of Baptist ministers within my knowledge in our region of country who have been guilty of such gross misconduct. Query, does Masonry and Odd-fellowship lead to drunkenness and wife-whipping, or do that kind of men seek Masonry and Odd-fellowship for assistance and concealment? One thing I know. When I used to attend the Odd-fellows lodge it was customary after adjournment to go to the tavern and have a good time drinking. And a Masonic minister in defending Masonry said he knew he had been enabled to do some good by being a Mason. The lodge where he belonged were in the habit of going to the tavern and drinking, and he had it stopped.

ELDER S. E. MILLER.

LYMAN ABBOTT ON THE CASE OF CORNELIUS.

The Christian Union stands high for its talent, and the name of Lyman Abbott, as editor, gives his articles an influence which even those of its former editor (H. W. Beecher) would not now command. But these are days when readers should try the spirits when they write on Bible topics; and especially on the national Sunday-school lessons, to which millions of young people have their attention drawn every week.

Let us note some of Mr. Abbott's comments on "The Case of Cornelius" in the April 26th issue. Whilst we agree with much that is said, we fear that there are marks of the cloven foot of Masonic doctrine interwoven, we hope not intentionally, therewith. To illustrate what we mean we quote from a Masonic author, Webb's Monitor, page 285:

"So broad is the religion of Masonry and so carefully are all sectarian tenets excluded from the system that the Christian, the Jew and the Mohammedan may and do harmoniously combine in its moral and intellectual work with the Buddhist, the Parsee, the Confucian and the worshipper of deity under every form. The Ten Commandments or their equivalent embrace the gist of the Masonic religion, and whatever system of faith contains them without anything that contravenes them accords with the Masonic."

So much for the gospel of Masonry which ignores the Christ of the New Testament. Now read Mr. Abbott:

"To work righteousness is to do justly, to forsake every evil way, to seek God's honor by patient continuance in well doing. Jew or Greek, Hindoo, Chinaman, Indian, or Anglo-Saxon, he who does this is accepted with God. He may dream dreams with the Brahmin, he may count beads with the Roman, he may learn ethics with the pupils of Confucius. . . . if he looks up with reverence, be it ever so ignorantly and blindly, to some supreme being above and beyond his ken, if he shows forth in his life a real purpose to please him by no mere scrap of time devoted to formal offerings, whether pagan or Christian, but by forsaking evil ways and thoughts . . . . by working righteousness—he is accepted of God."

There is here a striking similarity between the two teachings, but there is none the less a great difference between "The Masonic Religion" which, at best, seeks [its heaven by obedience to the Ten Commandments of Sinai which none but Christ, whom it ignores, ever fulfilled, and which tolerates every other sort of worshipper in its brotherhood—there is a great difference between this religion and that which says, "Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world," or as we can happily say in Mr. Abbott's concluding words, "I owe everything to one who has bought for me a redemption from ungodliness and all unrighteousness, and who raises me up and makes me sit in heavenly life in Christ Jesus."

Yes; Christianity leads us to that conclusion, and to renounce every other religion for its supremacy in us, and over us; but the religion of Masonry demands the subjection of Christianity, and every other, to itself as "the center of union;" and then permits each to continue in their respective delusions and errors. Their Christ is not the only name given under heaven whereby men must be saved.

We would also suggest a seeming contradiction to the Scriptures in these words: "If he (pagan) looks up with reverence, be it ever so ignorantly and blindly, to some supreme Being above and beyond his ken," etc., he is accepted, for the Scriptures tell us "that he who cometh to God must believe that he is, and that he is a rewarder of those that diligently seek him." Read Acts 17, what Paul did at Athens. Why such zeal if such worshippers were right or accepted?

We see no use of speculating in thoughts and fancies not revealed. It is worse than useless, for it is pernicious and dangerous to be wise above what is revealed in the Scriptures. Let us not forget that ten tribes went off into popular error, and that only two remained true to the Jerusalem worship. Such remarks as some made on this lesson tend to weaken the zeal for missions, and the force of the command, "Go into all the world, preach the Gospel to every creature. He that believes and is baptized shall be saved," Yes, "Jesus and the resurrection" must be preached, and the representative ordinances of the Gospel must be observed ere he can reign through his visible church "where e'er the visible sun doth his successive journeys run." But true philosophy and true Christianity may rejoice together in the glorious truth that those who have not the law and are a law unto themselves will be judged without law by righteous judgment, for the Judge of all the earth will do right. ANTI-LODGE CHURCH WORK.

JEWELL, Kansas, May 1st, 1883.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—In our church here there are, in a membership of about eighty, only one Odd-fellow, and no Mason. I am quietly but steadily scattering your paper, tracts and books among the people, whose eyes are being opened to the enormity of the conspiracy against human rights, planned and being executed by Masonry through its hydra heads in every department of life. Now and then I call attention to the subject in my sermons, and often in private conversation, and by these means a standard is being raised against these abominations, around which God's true people are gathering for the coming conflict.

At another church for which I preach there are only two Odd-fellows, and no Masons. It is the universal testimony of our brethren that those who unite with the orders lose their interest in religion in a large measure. Since last December we have had twenty-two additions to our church here—none of them secretists. I hope in 1884 to see a telling vote polled for the American ticket in this and Republic county. In the one body,

J. T. KIGGINS.

THE CONFERENCE.

A Pennsylvania "friend," and neighbor of the writer he speaks of, commends warmly the article on the "Religion of Masonry" in the Cynosure of April 5th. Perhaps several thousands of readers were benefited by the same article and thus incalculable good done:

"I am glad to see 'D. E.' out in the columns of the Cynosure. His article on the Masonic Religion is truthful, vigorous and original. I siucerely hope we shall see more of him in the Cynosure. He is a firm friend of the N. C. A., and has done not a little in past years for the cause in Pennsylvania. If God in his providence should favor him in his present enterprises, as I sincerely hope he may, our noble reform will not be forgotten by him. I know the will is present and think the way is not far off. He has felt the power of the 'Secret Empire' in his business relations, but it is in prospect of better days."

Bro. W. H. Chandler, presiding Elder in the U. B. church, now residing at Dover, Ill., and assisting in the Academy there, sends a very warm commendation, which we value the more, since it is from a worthy and judicious minister of Christ:

"I am greatly pleased with the Cynosure, and as I have said to others, I say to you, that I believe there is no paper being printed that is doing as much for God in proportion to its circulation as the Cynosure. I shall extend its influence wherever I can. I heartily wish every minister in the U. B. church was taking it and endorsing its utterances."

Bro. W. E., of Fairfield, Iowa, puts the guilt of our government in licensing the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors before us so clearly that we wonder why Christians have not prayed more earnestly for the abolition of this great evil. Read this:

"I wish to ask your many readers a few questions. I do it, for fear of a great calamity that may come upon our nation on account of our national sin. First, is it morally right for our government to take a revenue for the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors? Second, is it morally right for a State or city to give license to any party to sell intoxicating liquors? Third, does our nation recognize and protect the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors now as much as it did American slavery before the civil war? Fourth, which has been the greatest sin or curse to the nation, American slavery or the slavery of intemperance? Fifth, what may we expect that the great and just God will bring upon this nation because of the sin of intemperance, when we think of the terrible calamity God permitted or caused to come on this nation for the great national sin of American slavery?"

—Fourteen young men have graduated this spring from the U. P. Theological Seminary, Allegheny City, Pa., and nine others from the Seminary in Xenia, O. A couple of dozen young men entered on the good work of preaching the gospel is glad news, but they are far too few to meet the demand for such laborers in this denomination. The many new fields for ministerial and missionary labors, that are being opened up, together with the frequent deaths of those already in the work, makes the old declaration still true of this church as of many others, that "the harvest is great, but the laborers are few."—Sandy Lake News.

INTRODUCTION.—The dispersion after the death of Stephen sent the Gospel to Antioch, and the church was founded about A. D. 40. Barnabas and Saul had labored faithfully in that city for more than a year, and this earnest consecration of believers, resulted, under the Holy Spirit, in the grand foreign mission, introducing the Gospel to the Gentiles. Christians were so named first in this city, Ch. 11: 26. In answer, doubtless, to earnest prayer and fasting, connected with special religious services, the Holy Spirit ordered through this church, the ordination of the first Foreign Mission.

ANALYSIS. 1. Prophets and teachers prepared the church for their work. New Testament prophets taught under the illumination of the Spirit. They and "teachers" answer to "pastors and teachers" now. Eph. 4: 11, . c. Their work the same now. Eph. 4: 12—"furnishing" or "fitting" the saints, (private members) to do the iwork of "ministering" and "building" the body of Christ. What are pastors to do? 1 Pet. 5: 2. What are the flock to do? Matt. 5: 14, 16; Jas. 5: 19, 20; Acts 11: 20; Mark 16: 15, 16.

2. What were they doing? Why fasting? Matt. 17: 21. What words did the Holy Spirit use? Can an "influence" speak? To whom did he speak? v. 1. f. c. Who calls the agents he chooses? What character had Barnabas? Acts 11: 24. How was Saul called? Acts 9: 15. To whom was he ever after obedient?

3. By whom were the missionaries appointed? What need of fasting and prayer? Why lay on hands? What obligation in sending them away? Heb. 15: 16. What evidence that this church abounded in great works? Acts 11: 27-30.

4. Who sent them out? How did the Spirit do it? To what place first? Was it familiar? Acts 4: 36.

5. What did they preach? In what way? vs 38, 39, 44. Who was this John? Acts 12: 25. What service did he render?

6. Whom did they find? How was he a false prophet?

7. What was he doing? What did the deputy do? What character does this show? What is necessary to salvation?. John 5: 24. What for sanctification? Rom. 3: 20. Have you heard his voice?

8. What made the sorcerers visit them? Elymas, Arabic, magician. Acts 16: 19.

9. What place does Paul take after this? What did he do as Saul? Acts 8: 3; 1 Tim. 1: 13; Acts 22: 19, 20. What did he suffer as Paul? 2 Cor. 11: 24-27. What promise fulfilled to him? Acts 1: 2; 9: 17.

10. What character had the impostor? How did he "pervert" the "right ways" of the Lord? John 14: 17; Eph. 6: 12; Heb. 1: 14. Emissary of Satan, Prince of Power of the air.

11. What judgment fell upon him? Similarity to Paul's experience? Acts 22: 11.

12. Effect on deputy? What astonished him? Mark 1: 27; 16: 20.

LESSONS.—1. This missionary enterprise grew out of the teaching of the church in the doctrine of Christ. What book did they use? What difference between Manæn and Herod? What made the difference? 2. With Christ uplifted to sinners, the Holy Spirit always fulfils his work. Who is our guide now? Who gives each his work? What work has he given you? Are you doing it, with his aid? 3. Christ wants the best men for missionaries. What standing of Paul and Barnabas? Who supported them? v. 3. What obligations on Christians now? Are you giving steadily to missions? Are you praying as you give, and giving as you pray? 4. Satan always tries to thwart a work of grace in the heart. Chiefly by perverting the true way! What security for Christian workers? v. 9, "filled with the Holy Ghost." (The word indicates a sudden supernatural impulse.) Are you now aiding or perverting the ways of truth. 5. What then convinced the thoughtful and "prudent," convinces now. The manifested power and presence of God with the truth, as it is in Jesus, is declared and faithfully preached or taught. Power from on High is promised. Are we who teach "endued with the power?" Are you convinced, dear friend, that Christ has died for you and has saved you?—Notes for Bible Study.

NOTE.—Every objection to modern missions is here answered by the Holy Ghost himself:—

1. There were many unconverted ones at Antioch, as there are now in Christian lands. And there always will be till we obey God, and preach the Gospel to every creature.

2. All the men and means are needed at home. But the missionary spirit brings more men and means to the home work than if none went as missionaries.

3. What a waste of men! But the Holy Spirit selected the best men in the ancient church for this foreign work.

4. The heathen are well enough off without the Gospel. Why, then, did the Holy Spirit send Paul to them?

5. The same obligation rests on us, as on this ancient church, to send the Gospel to the heathen.

6. The preparation for the Gospel is much the same now as then. (1) There was, as is now, a weakening of the heathen religions and a hunger for more life. (2) The world was largely under one government, defending and making highways for the missionaries. So now the power of the world is in the hands of Christian governments, who own half the land, and control all the seas of the world. (3) The English language is almost as universal and influential as the Greek in Paul's time. (4) The dispersion of the Jews in all countries prepared the way for the Gospel. So Christian colonies and commerce have made a highway for the Gospel in our day.—Peloubet.

AN HONORABLE RETRACTION.

The Rochester, N. Y., Morning Herald, having published some severe strictures on the sermon at the Washington funeral which was lately interrupted by lodge members, takes occasion from the prompting of our old friend Clark, "the Liberty Singer," to make the amende honorable thus:

"We have received from an esteemed correspondent at Dansville a communication enclosing an article from the Christian Cynosure explaining from President Blanchard's standpoint the unpleasant scene reported to have occurred at a funeral held in Washington a few Sundays ago, and respecting which we indulged in some editorial remarks. It was understood at the time, we presume, that our article was based upon a press dispatch from Washington which we presumed to be accurate, but which, we now conclude, misrepresented the facts. We have not room for the long article sent to us, but may say briefly that Dr. Blanchard, in a letter to the Cynosure, explains that he officiated at the funeral of young Mr. Ford at the request of the latter's father, who was an old and intimate friend. The deceased was a member of a number of secret societies, and many of his former associates were present, including some chaplains of the orders. There had been some efforts made by the latter to take charge of the services, but Mr. Ford insisted upon having Dr. Blanchard officiate. In a few introductory remarks the latter explained that the 'church had not been engaged, and a funeral is not the place to discuss secret societies,' and he therefore should say nothing on the subject except to announce himself prepared to discuss them in another place and on another occasion with any champion of the orders. After he had taken his text and proceeded for some time with his sermon, a lady cried out, 'I am fainting,' etc. The house was thrown into confusion and the services concluded. Dr. Blanchard was asked to finish them at the grave, but declined, thinking that it would be better for the pastor to do so. According to his statement, and others accompanying it, the affair was gravely misrepresented in the press dispatches and the newspapers of the country misled by the report.

"We give so much of the correction for the reason that we commented at the time severely upon Dr. Blanchard's course on the presumption that the press dispatch was true."

It should also be noted that the Daily Spy of Worcester, Mass., also corrected its first misstatement of the case. The Advance of this city also put the case briefly and pointedly in an editorial note, and called on the lodge defenders to make an explanation. The Congregationalist of Boston, on the other hand, seemed to take peculiar satisfaction in publishing the slander once and again.

EDITORIAL LETTERS.

SCIENTIST AGAINST SCIENTIST—LEAVING WASHINGTON—THE JOURNEY HOMEWARD—KIND RECEPTION FOR OUR REFORM FAIRLY WON.—THE WASHINGTON BUILDING AND ITS LOCATION.

WASHINGTON, D. C. May 8th, 1883.

Last Sabbath I heard a superb sermon from Rev. Dr. Rankin of the Congregational church here. It is the largest of the large churches in this city, and it was packed with a living mass of humanity, deep galleries and all. Dr. Rankin preached on the unity of the human race; and seldom have I heard a clearer, abler discourse. He gave his authorities (scientists) for the doctrine of eight diverse origins of our race as the least that would possibility explain ethnological varieties. "The Bible, of course, must get out of the way of science, or be run over." Then a single scientist arose and taught that the whole race entire, came up from "Protoplasm. Presto! The eight origins which rested on literal scientific demonstration, all sunk into nonentity! and the whole body of savans of science, on the new theory or guess of one of their number, shouted; Great is Protoplasm!" "The human race is one, and protoplasm is its father!"

Mr. Rankin then showed beautifully, and scripturally, in what the unity of our race consists, and gave extracts from Livingstone, wife, and daughter, whose piety, and purity and sufferings drew tears from our eyes.

I went yesterday to the Congressional Cemetery and the Congressional Library, and the Cynosure readers may hear from my notes taken in both places.

MAY 9.—After full consultation with Secretary Stoddard, I am to leave here to-morrow morning. Warm invitations from Pennsylvania and Connecticut, incline me to take Harrisburg, Philadelphia, New York, Willimantic, Worcester, and Saratoga on my way home.

Paul exhorts Christians to "be followers" of him, as he was of Christ, and that apostle is particular to mention courtesies extended to him while he, as I am, was laboring to dethrone false and spurious worships and to establish Christ's worship in the nations. His example is my warrant for saying, that I came here in the last of February and am to leave the 10th of May. I had expected to be here but three or four weeks.

I have preached here in the First Presbyterian, assisted at communion in the Sixth Presbyterian, and opened by prayer a large social meeting in the Metropolitan Presbyterian church. I have spoken in the Fruit-Growers and Bessie Beach's public receptions, have taken part in the Woman's Christian Temperance meetings, and have opened with prayer the Dashaway club meeting in Masonic and Odd-fellows halls; and, on the day after the city papers here, at the instigation of the lodge, poured out the infamous false-hoods about the Ford funeral, I was by a unanimous vote invited to sit with the Washington city presbytery as an honorary member, to which I responded in a brief speech which is published in the Christian Instructor of Philadelphia. And, within the last four days, being about to leave, I have received the cordial benizons of three pastors here, whose congregations exceed in numbers and wealth, by far, all other Protestant congregations in Washington. And so far from having purchased this recognition of our cause by silence or toadyism, I have preached three times, in our headquarters here, point blank against the secret lodge system; and have distributed my printed cards, announcing me as editor of the Cynosure and Emeritus President of Wheaton College; and the lodge press here has told who I am.

It is proper here to say that whatever good comes to our cause here in Washington is, and will be, under God, the immediate and direct result of Secretary Stoddard's rare and excellent choice and judgment assisted by Messrs. Pomeroy and Ford. Our building here, when renovated complete would sell for much more than has been paid and promised for it; and the location is to say the least most admirable,—near the Capitol, close by the City Hall and District offices, almost under the shadow of the First Presbyterian and Metropolitan Methodist churches, and, what is somewhat significant it is near by the Masonic headquarters, and also near the building where the Liberty Party, (afterwards called Republican) planted its first printing press under Dr. Gamaliel Bailey.

The only remaining drawback, is, Our building is not paid for. But I do not permit myself to believe, that a mortgage of towards six thousand dollars (more than two thousand are already paid,) is to stand against our resplendent head-quarters here, for six months, if indeed it is not wiped off in three.

In the joyous hope of soon meeting and greeting family, friends and neighbors at home. I am,

Yours in Christ. J. BLANCHARD.

NOTES.

Mr. Peter H. Grisham, of East Tennessee, is one of the most interesting of our friends, and the friends of cause met here in Washington. He has paid to Mr. Hinman for chairs for our building and other objects more than one hundred dollars, and has given interest and afforded profit to our religious meetings. He has lent me his war scrap-book, which is intensely interesting, and our readers must have the benefit of his articles.

I yesterday (May 9th) went down to Mt. Vernon for the first time, and will describe it when I have time. The guide showed the Masonic apron of Lafayette. (I believe Quaker women, in part at least, own Mt. Vernon, and keep up the show of a Masonic apron.) I asked aloud, "Is Washington's Masonic apron here?" "No," the guide replied, "it is kept in the lodge at Alexandria.' If a ghost had spoken the crowd would have behaved just as they did.

Two gentlemen, a merchant from Detroit and a manufacturer from Connecticut, were on the boat; both Republicans, the last defeated for Congress by prohibition.

"What is to become of the Republican party?" The two agreed that its only hope of success lay in "the blunders of the Democrats."

"What of prohibition?" "I dislike it because it defeated me for Congress." "I don't believe we have a right to prohibit by law the manufacture of alcohol."

"Do you believe we have a right to prohibit the making and selling adulterated sugar, medicines, etc.?" "O, yes."

"Do you believe there is one gallon of liquor sold by saloons which is not more or less adulterated?" "Perhaps not."

"If prohibition of bad meat is lawful, why not bad whisky?" "O, the law should prohibit the adulteration, not the whisky. Men will have it."

"Is it right to prohibit counterfeit money?" "Certainly."

"But men will have it; and whisky is counterfeit corn."

My friend was silent, and very kind and gentlemanly during the voyage.

Cherokee Indians were employed to murder Union men in Tennessee, as I learn from a letter in my possession, of which our readers shall hear. Albert Pike's scalpers at Pea Ridge are well known. After using Indians to tomahawk our troops, Masons are now filling the Pension Office with ex-rebel clerks to make out pensions for the widows whose husbands their hireling Indians killed. The age of wonders is not ended, if miracles are. J. B.

—Rev. D. A. Richards, who went to California some two years ago at his own charges as a home missionary, is about returning to Clarksville, Mich. Bro. Richards has also lectured against the secret orders during the past year under appointment from the State committee.

—A pleasant call from friend E. Z. Derbyshire, of Ypsilanti, Mich., last week resulted in a substantial addition to the Washington fund, he paying most of his fifty dollar pledge for that object. Bro. Derbyshire is on his way to Kansas to locate a farm.

—Rev. Albert Sims, of Galt, Ontario, has for several years been publishing a small but energetic and useful monthly, the Radical Christian, radical and true in its position on all Christian reforms. He has lately transferred the paper to the publisher of the Vanguard of St. Louis. While regretting that this light has been put out in Canada, it will yet, we hope, burn brightly still in its new candlestick.

—The papers inform us of the marriage of General J. W. Phelps of Brattleboro, Vt., an old friend and constant and valued constibutor to these columns, and for whom Anti-masonic voters had the pleasure of casting their ballots in 1880 for President. The Cynosure sends its warmest congratulations.

—The anniversary exercises of the Normal and Agricultural Institute of Hamptou, Va., occur on the 24th inst. The Cynosure returns thanks for a card of invitation. Last year this anniversary was reported in our columns by Rev. H. T. Cheever, of Worcester, and Bro. Hinman visited the institution in the fall and described in his letters the interesting arrangements for the education of colored and Indian children.

—For items of persoual mention this week it must be noted that President Blanchard left Washington on Thursday last and we hope to greet him here before next Sabbath. Bro. Stoddard remains for a few days in Washington. Bro. Hinman took a severe cold during the Nebraska convention and was almost disabled, but his faith and zeal surmounted his bodily indisposition and he will speak at points in Iowa as he returns.

—To Bro. A. H. Springstein, recording secretary of the Michigan Convention, we are indebted for a report of the late meeting in Grand Rapids; but Bro. Day was a few days earlier and reported so fully that little more could be said. We have reported Bro. Springstein as lecturer for the State, understanding that he was so appointed. He corrects us, but we take the liberty of continuing his name in the lecture list, and hope the Michigan brethren will frequently make use of his abilities as a lecturer.

—The United Brethren in Christ. Chambersburg, Pa., speaks in highest commendation of the Thad. Stevens number of the Cynosure April 5th. We confidently send out the present number, believing that for features of special interest it surpasses any that have preceded it. Let every reader do his part in extending our list. Bro. Tobey's note reads thus:

"President Blanchard has been doing good work while in Washington. His Cynosure article on the life of Thaddeus Stevens is a powerful and intensely interesting paper. The portrait of the Great Commoner in that paper, is valuable to those who have never been permitted to see the greatest man Pennsylvania ever had. The Cynosure in thus giving deserved honor to this man, ought to receive a thousand new subscribers in this State."

—A few weeks since we marked with surprise and regret a note in the American Freeman of Albany, Mo., that its publication would be suspended for an indefinite time. Knowing too well the character of the brethren who control the paper to believe that the notice meant more than a temporary discontinuance, the Cynosure made no note of the matter at the time since the mere statement of the fact even would be unwarrantably discouraging. The sun came from behind the cloud last week and the number for May 10 proves that the temporary obscuration only proved a blessing in disguise. Brethren Needles and Butler, have secured for an office editor and assistant in their noble and self-sacrificing work, Mr. J. C. Midyett, who introduces himself in a very favorable manner, and will prove, we trust, an assistant worthy of the men with whom he is associated. Bro. Butler, as field editor, will do his part ably and well, as heretofore. He has just returned from a five weeks trip in Iowa. Friends in Missouri and Southern Iowa should see to it that the Freeman flag ever waves from the top of the staff.

—The Cynosure has lately borrowed from the Century magazine some entertaining descriptions of the religious customs and secret orders prevailing among the Zuni tribe of Indians living on the western border of New Mexico. We have no doubt of their correctness, since Mr. Cushing, the writer, has been three years living with the tribe and had passed through their infamous initiations, to the ruin of his health. Possibly we have not yet reached the bottom facts in this case, since Miss Frances E. Willard in her trans-continental temperance journey has found other observers of these Indians. She writes to the Signal on the authority of a correspondent of the daily press, Mr. T. A. Smith of Decatur, Ill., that:

"Frank Cushing is not looked upon as final authority on Zuni-land by any except the 'tenderfeet' (i. e., Easterners.) Col. Stevenson, who makes far less fuss, is far more wise. The latter has made a set of photos of Indian scenery and people, of which there are but three sets, valued at one thousand dollars each. They are unapproached by any other student of the aborigines; but Col. S. is a very modest, retiring man, and not properly "brought out" as yet. There are eighteen pueblos (or connected adobe houses forming a commonwealth) in New Mexico. All the Pueblo Indians are Catholics, as a rule, having the form without much of the power of godliness. They are a harmless, inoffensive class, cultivating the ground, polishing up fragments of beer bottles and selling them at the trains to incredulous tourists as "native topaz," making impossible animals out of clay and retailing them at good figures to the same innocent pilgrims, and otherwise doing well for themselves."

—The Wesleyan brethren are raising funds for another academy for higher education—"Houghton Seminary" in New York. This will be the third institution of the kind, the others being at Wasioja, Minn., and Purdy, Tenn.

—A Freemason Congregational pastor at the Worcester, Mass., ministers' meeting publicly defended gambling. The same thing was done by a Masonic minister in the Belknap Quarterly Meeting. Sin blinds the eyes.

HON. SAMUEL C. POMEROY.

This gentleman is sprung from a heroic and long-lived lineage. Bancroft's United States History, Vol. I., makes honorable mention of them, particularly of Col. Seth Pomeroy, who commanded a regiment at Bunker Hill. Among his female ancestors was a girl, who, being shabbily treated by her affianced lover, who quit her, married a rival and settled across the street from her parents, instead of crying about it, quietly sent her bundle of clothing on shipboard, crossed the ocean without friends, except those she made on board, and, in this then new world, became the celebrated Grace Martin whose name was given to their daughters by mothers in following generations.

Senator Pomeroy has an aunt now living (1883) who is one hundred and two years old. "She lived while Washington commanded the American armies; and among the people who threw tea into Boston harbor to resist unjust taxation." His other ancestral relatives had, as a rule, large families and long lives.

From this ancestry he received a strong constitution, and hatred of oppression, with courage to utter it. This sketch designs to give his early life, his border war-fare experiences in Kansas, his twelve years in the U. S. Senate while our national capitol was an active political volcano, his throttling grapple with secret societies, and to trace, for a little, the shadows which he projects into the future.

HIS EARLY HISTORY.

He was born in Southampton, Mass., Jan. 3rd, 1816. He grew up as other farmers' sons do, where the soil is hard, labor honorable, and mind and atmosphere clear; among New England hills, whose summits are still dark with evergreens, and their shaded, rocky sides, musical with trout-brooks, the drumming of wood-pheasants, and the chattering of squirrels. Here he early united, as did Webster, with a Congregational church, but unlike poor Mr. Webster he has not gone back on his Christian profession. He was, for a time, a student in Amherst College, whence he proceeded to western New York, and was for awhile a student in the law office of William H. Seward.

In 1840, when he had reached the combustible age of 24, the long roll called to drill for our slavery war. It took twenty years to complete that drill. That year Myron Holley, Alvan Stewart, Joshua Leavitt, Lewis Tappan, Gerrit Smith, and few like spirits, formed the LIBERTY PARTY, against the stern opposition and rebukes of Wm. Lloyd Garrison. Young Pomeroy walked on foot to the county-seat of Wayne county, N. Y., and, as O'Connell got up his first Repeal meeting, by getting one man to hold another by the collar till he went out and brought in a third, Pomeroy got up a meeting and nominated a ticket for the county which received eleven votes. Six years later that county elected the Liberty party ticket. Mr. Pomeroy went back to New England, with the young wife whom he had married, to care for and comfort his aged father. Here, against the overwhelming influence of the Whig party, and Mr. Webster, its political idol, Mr. Pomeroy alternated with the great button manufacturer and philanthropist, Samuel Williston, one running for Congress the other for the legislature. At the end of eight years Mr. Pomeroy was sent to the legislature, where he helped to make Geo. S. Boutwell, Governor, and send Henry Wilson to the U. S. Senate.

During Mr. Pomeroy's membership in the legislature at Boston, Anthony Burns, accused of being a fugitive slave, was seized by U. S. authorities and sent South. The Boston court house was surrounded with chains to keep off the indignant multitude while the case was heard; for, like the prosecutors of John and of Christ, "they feared the people." Mr. Pomeroy, like Thaddeus Stevens, held that by the Constitution slaves were "persons," that "no person could be deprived of life, liberty, or property," but "by due process of law," which meant "trial by jury," which, of course, Burns was denied. He therefore denounced the rendition of Burns as kidnapping. In his speech he said:

> "What! return a MAN not convicted of crime to hopeless slavery! to a condition darker than death and more damning than perdition! death and the grave are not without their hope. Light from the hills of immortality sends a gleam across their darkness and bids the sleepers hope. But remorseless slavery swallows up not the man only; but his hapless offspring forever!"

No one, not then living, can form an adequate idea of the boldness of that speech, and the nerve required to utter it. By such speeches of Mr. Pomeroy and his associates, Massachusetts' sentiment was changed to what it now is, when not only a court house but Bunker Hill Monument would be torn, stone from stone, if either was shielding the rendition of a slave; nay, changed to what Massachusetts' sentiment originally was, when the first two slaves from Africa landed upon her coast were ordered by her General Court to be "sent back to Africa at the publics expense."

Mr. Pomeroy happened in Washington in 1854 when the Kansas-Nebraska bill was passed, and cannon were bellowing in honor of the extension of slavery throughout the old Louisiana purchase up to the British possessions. He called on President Pierce, then about to sign that horrible bill, which repealed the Missouri Compromise and opened the heart of this mighty continent, Kansas and Nebraska included, to "the vilest slavery that ever saw the sun." The roar of the cannon was music to Pierce. It announced the triumph of his party in Congress.

"Sir," said Mr. Pomeroy, "this bill is not the triumph which you imagine. Its squatter sovereignty has only transferred the question from Congress to our prairies, and there, depend upon it, we shall beat you!" The prophecy was fulfilled; Kansas and Nebraska were admitted free; and owe their freedom to the subject of this sketch and his brave associates.

Mr. Douglas' indifference "whether slavery was voted up or voted down," was but simulated. No human creature ever looked on such a struggle with indifference. He meant to extend slavery and be its President. Mr. Lincoln likened his repealing the Missouri line in order to let slavery into Kansas to a farmer removing a fence between a hog-pasture and a pea-field: "When," said Mr. Lincoln, "even a hog would know what the object was in removing that fence."

Well, "Squatter Sovereignty" was voted, and Free State sovereigns accepted the gage. Like Ulysses, in the cave of the Cyclops—

> "'Twas for their lives their laboring bosoms wrought;
> They turned each scheme and sharpened every thought."

That very year, 1854, Mr. Pomeroy led the first battalion of Free State settlers from Massachusetts. They were over a week on the road. At Rochester, N. Y., August 27th, a mass of people met them and presented them with a Bible and a spelling-book. But men, hardened by the vices of slavery, would not learn the spelling-book or heed the Bible. So Mr. Pomeroy provided his settlers with Sharpe's rifles. He built a saw-mill at Lawrence for the first company, and sent the second on to Topeka, the present beautiful State capital. Events thickened. The Democracy ruled the nation; and Democrats fought for slavery, still calling themselves Democrats. Greeley likened them to boys crying "Hot mince pies," after their pies were frozen stiff. Governor after governor, sent there by Pierce and Buchanan, refused to obey the wishes of their unprincipled masters, by joining in the wholesale pillage and murder of the Free State settlers by border ruffians sent there by Jefferson Davis and paid by the Blue-lodges of the South—Democratic governors turned Republicans. Thus "God makes mad whom he will destroy."

Mr. Pomeroy purchased the ferry and Squatter Sovereign newspaper at Atchison. The ferry took over emigrants, and the paper brought back the news. John Brown's body was not yet mouldering in the grave, but his soul was marching on.

Mr. Pomeroy was five times arrested and twice sentenced to death by the janizaries of Buchanan, who was the most cowardly of mankind, and nothing is so cruel as cowardice. But "the stars, in their courses, fought against" slavery. The west winds bore the smell of patriot blood across the country to the Atlantic, and the great national torpor was broken. In two years (1856) the Republican party was organized; and from that time, after seven brief, eventful years, into which centuries seemed crowded,

> "The joyous sound was heard;
> Of man to freeman calling;
> Of broken fetters falling;
> And, like the carol of a cageless bird,
> The joyous shout of freedom's rallying word."

AS A SOLDIER.

Mr. Pomeroy stood by the settlers who were hunted by the ban-dogs of slavery. He was their feet when lame and their eyes when blind. His ferry took them across the river, and their own right arms defended them when there. He was not alone. Gen. James Lane ("Jim Lane" the settlers called him) was a most extraordinary character, a man born

> "Like lightning's fire
> To speed one bolt of vengeance and expire!"

Kansas can afford him a monument; a broken column, with the Genius of Liberty weeping under a cypress by his grave, and hiding her face. Gov. Robinson was there. O that he should live to be lionized by the drink-makers who murdered Lane by suicide! But John Brown was there, and other temperance men whose "souls are marching on." Mr. Pomeroy was one of these. He procured seeds, and they began to raise crops. The people hailed him as one of their deliverers. They elected and re-elected him mayor of Atchison, and in 1860, the year of Lincoln's election, they returned him to the U. S. Senate. He took the seat just left vacant by Jefferson Davis, and held it twelve years.

Mr. Pomeroy and Senator (Gen.) Lane, arrived at Washington on the 13th of April, 1861. Fort Sumpter capitulated to the rebels next day. Washington under Buchanan had become the paradise of brigands. Lincoln, the martyr, had skulked into the Presidency and capital of "THE GREATEST NATION ON THE GLOBE" in disguise, and in the night. The echoes of Sumpter and the Star of the West rung solemn in the dome of the Capitol, the muffled drums of a nation's funeral; and men and women were > "Whispering with white lips."

The streets were crowded, and Pomeroy and Lane went on the balcony at Willard's and harangued the motley multitude of rebel and loyal men. It was like singing the Bunker Hill ode to a thunder storm. Lane furnished the thunder crash, and Pomeroy sent the bolts! The proprietor came to them and said: "Gentlemen, you must cease speaking or they will tear down my house."

Virginia hung wavering like a continent in a earthquake. Her secession convention then in session, sent up a delegation to General Lee, then in his mansion on Arlington Heights. "Wine was in and wit was out," and the rebel delegation revealed their mission and their purpose to visit Gen. Lee that night. Pomeroy was young and "swift of foot," and he was there before them, behind the tall pillars of the verandah.

Gen. Lee came out and the Ahithophel of the delegation addressed to him an eloquent, artful speech, the purport of which was that Virginia, in her trouble, looked longingly on him, and begged him to take command of her troops. It was the apple of rebellion held out to Adam by his Eve. The fine looking, venerable man arose, reeling like a tall mast in conflicting winds, and uttered the speech which has been printed, ending, "But—I hear the voice of Virginia: I will take command of her troops."

Pomeroy ran to President Lincoln, told him that Lee was in rebellion, and begged him to "order his arrest." If Lincoln had been Gen. Jackson, it would have been done. Mr. Lincoln sent him to Secretary Seward. Seward told Pomeroy he was "mistaken." "Lee has been all day with Gen. Scott: and there is no more loyal man than Lee." Before night next day, Seward said to Pomeroy, "You was right! Lee commands the troops of Virginia; and will march them on Washington!"

"Glad of it;" said Pomeroy, "I hope he will take you first!"

Seward was a lawyer and said, "We have no 'constructive treason;' there must be acts to make treason, and Lee has only uttered words." Bosh! "Inter arma leges silent," and cannon balls were then flying.

Messrs. Pomeroy and Lane enlisted in an extempore battalion to defend the capital, and it was not taken by the rebels.

AS A SENATOR.

Mr. Pomeroy made a diversified twelve years Senate record of which Kansas and the nation should be proud.

July 16, 1861, he brought in a "Bill to suppress the SLAVEHOLDERS' REBELLION!" This was what no member had dared to call the rebellion till it was called "the Slaveholders' Rebellion" in that bill. Seward was aghast. He wrote a letter which Mr. Pomeroy now has, saying in substance, "If we can save the Union with Jefferson Davis pulling it down on one side and Lovejoy and Pomeroy on the other, it will be a miracle indeed!" Destroy the Union by uttering what Mr. Seward himself, and every rational man believed and knew to be the truth,—"The Slaveholder's Rebellion!" This bill was introduced by Mr. Pomeroy, just twelve days after taking his seat in the Senate.

January, 1862, "He boldly and alone took the ground that slavery did not legally exist in the District of Columbia; and procured the liberation from the jail of all slaves placed there by their owners for safe keeping." In February, he advocated confiscating and freeing the slaves of rebels.

In April he moved to amend the bill abolishing District slavery and paying $300 for each slave liberated, by giving the $300 to the slave and not to the master. In May he advocated and voted to educate the colored children of the District. In the same month he advocated using colored troops for suppressing the rebellion. In June, same year, he voted to prohibit slavery in the Territories. He opposed all payments for emancipated slaves.

March 5, 1866, when advocating the Fourteenth Amendment, this was his peroration:

> "By all the memories which cluster about the pathway in which we have been led; by the sacrifices, suffering, blood and

PASSING BY.

"And they told him that Jesus of Nazareth passed by."
O rich man, from your happy door,
Seeing the old, the sick, the poor,
Who ask for nothing, scarcely weep,
To whom even heaven means only sleep,
While you, given good things without measure,
Sometimes can hardly sleep for pleasure,
Let not the blessed moment fly,
Jesus of Nazareth passes by.

Is there a sinner, tired of sin,
Longing a new life to begin?
But all the gates of help are shut,
And all the words of love are mute;
Earth's best joys sere, like burnt-up grass,
And even the very heavens as brass?
Turn not away so pitilessly;
Jesus of Nazareth passes by.

Self-hardened man, of smooth, bland smile;
Woman, with heart like desert isle
Set in the sea of household love,
Whom nothing save "the world" can move;
At your white lie, your sneering speech,
Your backward thrust no sword can reach.
Look, your child lifts a wandering eye:
Jesus of Nazareth passes by.

O all ye foolish ones, who feel
A sudden doubt, like piercing steel,
When your dead hearts within you burn,
And conscience sighs, "Return, return,"
Why let ye the sweet impulse fleet,
Love's wave wash back from your tired feet,
Knowing not him who came so nigh,
Jesus of Nazareth passing by?

He must not pass. Hold him secure—
In likeness of his humble poor;
Of many a sick soul, sin-beguiled;
In innocent face of little child:
Clasp him—quite certain it is he—
In every form of misery;
And when thou meet's him up on high,
Be sure he will not pass thee by.

SALEM WITCHCRAFT.

Much has been said and written, more or less justly, in condemnation of those strange proceedings; however, from this time forth the belief in witchcraft began to wane in New England, and the civil authorities noticed it no more. In justice to the misguided actors in this sad tragedy it ought to be remembered that for half a century afterward, the law of the mother country, as it always had done, still made witchcraft a capital crime; and within thirty years after these terrible scenes in Salem, persons accused of witchcraft were condemned and put to death, both in England and Scotland; in the former a mother and her daughter—nine years old—perished together on the same scaffold; in the latter, six years afterward, an old woman was burned as a witch; and even Blackstone, when writing on the laws of England in the latter half of the eighteenth century, deems witchcraft a crime.

No one of these persons at Salem suffered by that barbarous form of execution—burning; nor were they put to the rack and torture. What a tribute it is to the integrity of these twenty victims that they refused to stain their souls with the crime of falsehood, "and went to the gallows rather than soil their consciences by the lie of confession." For if they confessed themselves to be witches, "and promised blameless lives for the future, they were uniformly pardoned."

The seven magistrates composing this illegal court held at Salem were evidently sincere in the performance of their official duties, yet the sternness of Stoughton, the chief judge, seems to savor of fanaticism, as shown in his permitting the trials to be hurried through without proper deliberation; had they been postponed to the regular meeting of the general court, some months distant, the issue, no doubt, would have been far different. The magistrates in Plymouth Colony were more enlightened, for when many years previous to this time, two prosecutions for witchcraft having been brought before them, the accused were declared not guilty.

Notwithstanding this mistaken zeal in punishing imaginary crime, it is but justice to notice that the penal laws enacted by the Puritans of New England were in their humane characteristics far in advance of those of the same period in Europe, especially in England, with which the comparison may be more properly made. Even down to 1819 there were in England two hundred and twenty-three offences punishable with death, while in the very first formation of the government in the colonies of Massachusetts, Connecticut and New Haven, the crimes punished capitally were limited to seventeen, and some of these with express reservations, "leaving the exaction of the supreme penalty to the discretion of the court." "Larceny above the value of twelve pence was a capital crime in England;" also "to kill a deer in the king's forest, or to export sheep from the kingdom." It is but just to compare the laws enacted in these colonies with the contemporary ones in the motherland, and not with those of the last quarter of the nineteenth century. The marvel is that, coming from a country where such barbarous laws were in force, the colonist had the moral power to rise above the prejudice and brutalities of the age, and frame penal laws so much more humane. It may serve as an explanation that the Puritans of New England fell back upon the code of Moses as a model, deeming that to be an embodiment of the law of God for his people; sometimes forgetting, however, that these laws did not fully apply in the seventeenth century of the Christian era. In the recognition of human rights these colonial law-givers were far in advance of the contemporary legislators of Europe.—From History of the American People of Prof. J. H. Patton.

MADAGASCAR.

Considering what a vast work English missionaries have accomplished in Madagascar, it is singular that so comparatively little should be known about the island. Covering an area nearly four times that of England and Wales, the place has been a trading station for at least nearly ten centuries; and yet until the publication of the late Dr. Mullen's more accurate work in 1879, the maps of the country hardly did more than prove that the interior was virtually unknown. Indeed, the entire area of this interesting land has never yet been thoroughly explored by Europeans; the geology has never been studied by competent scientists; nor does it appear that the flora and fauna have ever been properly classified. It is still, in a sense, a wonderland; but judging from the remains of one or two species of gigantic birds and tortoises which lived in the past—perhaps while the many volcanoes were still active—the country must once have been even more marvelous than it is today.

In regard to the inhabitants now living on the island, they strike us as being just the kind of people among whom Christianity is calculated to make rapid strides. Though not so far advanced in arts as either the Hindoos or the Chinese, they were still partially civilized when the missionaries first landed, and they never lapsed into such groveling superstitions as still oppress the larger populations of India and China. They were found without either temples or revolting images such as other pagan nations delight in; and such worship as they indulged in at all, was offered to one invisible Supreme Being who was recognized as the Creator. They are a tribal people and are mainly divided into three ranks—nobles, freemen and slaves—the slavery, however, not being that harsh system of servitude which we usually associate with the name. Thinly inhabited with under five millions of natives, the people are an agricultural race; but being strangers alike to properly made roads and European appliances, much has yet to be done before the vast resources of the island are even partially developed. It is admitted that Christianity alone has saved the country from lapsing into barbarism, as a natural outcome of the persecuting policy of the late Ranavalona I.; may present clouds be dispersed without ending in further disaster.—Christian Commonwealth.

SOME FACTS COMMONLY IGNORED.

Pythagoras, instructed as Moses had been by the Egyptians, surmised the true theory of the universe; but "Science" refuted him and chained down the human mind for two thousand years to its clever imaginations. All that time the patience of God waited for the true philosopher, while "Science" taught men to place implicite confidence in its own sublime abortion, that theory of the universe, empirical and utterly false, which is yet one of the most brilliant creations of the human mind. Two thousand years of scientific ignorance, of ignorance like Narcissus, admiring its own features, doted on a mere invention which led Alphonso of Castile to scoff at the Creator and to impeach the divine wisdom. "If I had been present at the creation," said he, "I could have given the Almighty some hints how to improve his work." All those ages the sun and moon shone on in their sweet reflections of the Divine "foolishness" that is wiser than man's wit. We owe to "Science" the enslavement of the human mind and its scorn of the Pythagorean theory for twenty centuries. To Copernicus, a theologian and an ecclesiastic, be it remembered, we owe true science; and to Christians, like Kepler and Newton, we owe the demonstrations which have emancipated the human intellect from the scientific fetters of ages. "Ah! but Galileo and the Inquisition," say they. What of that? To make the papal blunder a reproach to Christianity and the Christian church, you must assume, as sophists always do, that the papacy is part of the Christian religion. The author of Christianity has made his church and gospel responsible for nothing that he did not authorize. "Whence, then, hath it tares? Answer: "An enemy hath done this." The gospel is not to be charged with what its enemies have wrought in its name.—Bishop A. C. Coxe, in Independent.

OUR BOYS AND GIRLS.

BRIGHT FEET OF MAY.

Trip along, bright feet of May,
Trip along from day to day,
Trip along in sun and showers,
Trip along and wake the flowers,
Trip along the breezy hills,
Trip beside the prattling rills.
Trip along, in light and song,
Trip away, all fresh and gay,
Trip away, bright feet of May!

Trip along, when morning shines,
Trip along, when day declines,
Trip along, when, in the night,
Moon and stars are sparkling bright;
Trip across the sunny sea,
Over cloudland high and free.
Trip along, in light and song,
Trip away, all fresh and gay,
Trip away, bright feet of May!

Trip along the budding wood,
O'er the moorland solitude;
Trip through garden, field and brake,
Trip beside the gleaming lake;
Revel in the star-loved dew,
Drink the clear sky's summer blue.
Trip along, in light and song,
Trip away, all fresh and gay,
Trip away, bright feet of May!

Trip along, and, as you move,
Tell the springing earth of love;
Tell of love the sunlight free,
Tell of love the bounding sea,
The love of him who gave to May
The sweetness of its smiling day.
Trip along in light and song,
Trip away, all fresh and gay,
Trip away, bright feet of May!

"BOY WANTED."

People laughed when they saw the sign again. It seemed to be always in Mr. Peters' window. For a day or two, sometimes for only an hour or two, it would be missing, and passers-by would wonder whether Mr. Peters had at last found a boy to suit him; but, sooner or later, it was sure to appear again.

"What sort of a boy does he want, anyway?" one and another would ask, and then they would say to each other that they supposed he was looking for a perfect boy, and, in their opinion, he would look a good while before he found one. Not that there were not plenty of boys—as many as a dozen used sometimes to appear in the course of a morning, trying for the situation. Mr. Peters was said to be rich and queer, and, for one or both of these reasons, boys were very anxious to try to suit him. "All he wants is a fellow to run errands; it must be easy work and sure pay." This was the way they talked to each other. But Mr. Peters wanted more than a boy to run errands. John Simmons found that out, and this was the way he did it. He had been engaged that very morning, and had been kept busy all the forenoon, at pleasant enough work, and, although he was a lazy fellow, he rather enjoyed the place. It was toward the middle of the afternoon that he was sent up to the attic, a dark, dingy place, inhabited by mice and cobwebs.

"You'll find a long, deep box there," said Mr. Peters, "that I want to have put in order. It stands right in the middle of the room; you can't miss it."

John looked doleful. "A long, deep box. I should think it was!" he told himself, as the attic door closed after him. "It would weigh most a ton, I guess; and what is there in it? Nothing in the world but old nails, and screws, and pieces of iron, and broken keys and things; rubbish, the whole of it! Nothing worth touching, and it is as dark as a pocket up here, and cold besides; how the wind blows in through those knot-holes! There's a mouse! If there is anything that I hate it's mice. I'll tell you what it is; if old Peters thinks I'm going to stay up here and tumble over his rusty nails he's much mistaken. I wasn't hired for that kind of work."

Whereupon John bounced down the attic stairs, three at a time, and was found lounging in the show window, half an hour afterwards, when Mr. Peters appeared.

"Have you put that box in order, already?" was the gentleman's question.

"I didn't find anything to put in order; there was nothing in it but nails and things."

"Exactly; it was the 'nails and things' that I wanted put in order; did you do it?"

"No, sir; it was dark and cold up there; and I didn't see anything worth doing; besides, I thought I was hired to run errands."

"Oh!" said Mr. Peters, "I thought you were hired to do as you were told.' But he smiled pleasantly enough, and at once gave John an errand to do down town, and the boy went off chuckling, declaring to himself that he knew how to manage the old fellow; all it needed was a little standing up for your rights.

Precisely at six o'clock John was called and paid the sum promised him for a day's work, and then, to his dismay, he was told that his services would not be needed any more. He asked no questions; indeed, he had time for none, as Mr. Peters immediately closed the door.

The next morning the old sign "Boy Wanted," appeared in its usual place.

Before noon it was taken down, and Charlie Jones was the fortunate boy. Errands, plenty of them; he was kept busy until within an hour of closing. Then, behold, he was sent to the attic to put the long box in order. He was not afraid of a mouse, nor of the cold, but he grumbled much over that box; nothing in it worth his attention. However, he tumbled over the things, growling all the time, picked out a few straight nails, a key or two, and finally appeared with this message: "Here's all there is worth keeping in that old box; the rest of the nails are rusty, and the hooks are bent, or something."

"Very well," said Mr. Peters, and he sent him to the postoffice. What do you think? By the close of the next day Charlie had been paid and discharged, and the old sign hung in the window.

"I've no kind of notion why I was discharged," grumbled Charlie to his mother. "He said he had no fault to find, only he saw that I wouldn't suit. It's my opinion that he doesn't want a boy at all, and takes that way to cheat, mean old fellow."

It was Crawford Mills who was hired next. He knew neither of the other boys, and so did his errands in blissful ignorance of the "long box," until the second morning of his stay, when in a leisure hour he was sent to put it in order. The morning passed, dinner time came, and still Crawford had not appeared from the attic. At last Mr. Peters called him. "Got through?"

"No, sir; there's ever so much more to do."

"All right, it is dinner time now; you may go back to it after dinner." After dinner back he went. All the short afternoon he was not heard from, but just as Mr. Peters was deciding to call him again, he appeared.

"I've done my best, sir," he said, "and down at the very bottom of the box I found this." "This" was a five dollar gold piece."

"That's a queer place for gold," said Mr. Peters. "It's good you found it. Well, sir, I suppose you will be on hand to-morrow morning?" This he said as he was putting the gold piece in his pocket-book. After Crawford had said good-night and gone, Mr. Peters took the lantern and went slowly up the attic stairs. There was the long, deep box, in which the rubbish of twenty-five years had gathered. Crawford had evidently been to the bottom of it; he had fitted pieces of shingle to make compartments, and in these different rooms he had placed the articles, with bits of shingle laid on the top, and labelled thus, "Good screws," "picture nails," "small keys, somewhat bent," picture hooks," "pieces of iron whose use I don't know." So on through the long box. In perfect order it was at last, and very little that could be really called useful could be found within it. But Mr. Peters, as he bent over and read the labels, laughed gleefully and murmured to the mice: "If we are not both mistaken, I have found a boy, and he has found a fortune."

Sure enough the sign disappeared from the window and was seen no more. Crawford became the well-known errand boy of the firm of Peters & Co. He had a little room neatly fitted up, next to the attic, where he spent his evenings, and at the foot of the bed hung a motto which Mr. Peters gave him. "It tells your fortune for you, don't forget it," he said, when he handed it to Crawford; and the boy laughed and read it curiously. "He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much." "I'll try to be, sir," he said; and he never once thought of the long box over which he had been faithful.

All this happened years ago. Crawford Mills is no errand boy to-day, but the firm is Peters, Mills & Co. A young and rich man. "He found his fortune in a long box full of rubbish," Mr. Peters said once, laughing. "Never was a five dollar gold piece so successful in business as that one of his has been; it is good he found it." Then, after a moment of silence, he said, gravely: "No, he didn't; he found it in his mother's Bible. 'He that is faithful in that which is least, is faithful also in much.' It is true; Mills the boy was faithful, and Mills the man we trust."—Selected.

YANKEE WIT.

Many years ago, a Pittsburg iron firm purchased a lot of condemned bombshells for old iron. The shells were not loaded, but in order to melt them, it was necessary that they should be broken up. This was attempted with sledge hammers, but the laborers made but little progress, and it was finally given up as a bad job. One day a long slim yankee came along and said:

"I understand you have a job for a man here."

"Yes," was the reply; "we want that pile of bombs out there broken."

"How much will you pay?"

"We will give you a fip apiece (six and a quarter cents) if you will agree to break them all."

"I'll take the contract," answered the yankee.

The day was a cold one, and the thermometer down to zero. The man immediately went to work, but disdained to take the large sledge hammer which was offered him. The Yankee laid every bomb out on the ground with the hole up. He procured a bucket, and filled them all with water; then he came into the house, made out his bill, and said he would call around in the morning for the money. Everyone was much mystified, but in the morning their astonishment was great. The water had frozen during the night, and in the morning a pile of scrap iron was found, as the freezing water had broken every bomb into at least a dozen pieces.—Sel.

BAND OF HOPE BIBLE LESSON.—No. 6.

MODERN BAAL WORSHIP.

1. The Eleusinian mysteries which celebrated the return of the goddess Ceres with her daugbter Proscrpine from the regions of the dead to which the latter was fabled to have been carried by Pluto.

2. They were a form of Baal or sun worship like all the other pagan mysteries. Every nation had its secret religious rites unknown to the mass of the people.

3. They were celebrated with great secrecy, frequently in caverns and always at night.

4. They were scenes of revelling and debauchery. Even the wiser heathen disapproved of them.

5. St. Paul said "it was a shame even to speak of the things which were done of them in secret." Some writers think he meant by this, "It is a shame to speak of them without reproving them."

6. Freemasonry claims to be founded on the ancient mysteries.

7. They were a false religion; so is Masonry.

8. It has an altar and a priesthood: prayers and hymns and burial services. Besides it claims to be a universal religion.

9. It rejects Christ and tells men that if they are only good Masons, that will save them.

10. Masonic lodges only meet at night. We have seen it was so in the ancient mysteries.

11. A man before he becomes a Mason must be first blindfolded, and then led round the lodge three times from East to West following the exact course of the sun. This was a common rite in the ancient sun-worship.

12. In the mysteries the candidate was terrified with apparitions, unearthly noises, sudden flashes of light. He was also sworn under dreadful penalties not to reveal the secrets. Freemasonry does the same.

13. It obliges every man who becomes a Mason to take a number of fearful oaths and submit to a great many ceremonies which are not only ridiculous but blasphemous and wicked.

14. It makes its members swear to keep secret each others crimes, and very often help criminals to escape punishment. It persecutes and sometimes kills those who come out from it.

15. It is against all free government. A man who becomes a Mason must submit to the rules of the lodge even when he knows they conflict with the laws of his country.

16. God cannot bless a nation that tolcrates heathen practices.

17. We ought to read what good men have written about Masonry. Then we can tell others what a wicked thing it is, and perhaps prevent some from joining. And we should pray for its overthrow.

PRACTICAL TRUTHS.

Masonry is a false religion. It pretends to save men.

It is founded in principle and practice on the ancient sun-worship.

It is a foe to God and our free government.

We ought to learn all we can about it so as to warn others.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness but rather reprove them. Eph. 5:11.

QUESTIONS.

1. What works of darkness did Paul warn the Ephesians against?
2. What were these "mysteries?"
3. Why were they called "works of darkness?"
4. Why were they called unfruitful?
5. What did St. Paul say further about them? Eph. 5:12.
6. Have we anything similar at the present day?
7. What is one point of resemblance?
8. How do we kdow Freemasonry is a religion?
9. How do we know it is a false religion?
10. In what other respect is it like these pagan mysteries?
11. Is there still another point of resemblance?
12. Name another.
13. How is Freemasonry a work of darkness?
14. What else does it do?
15. Is it then consistent with a free government?
16. Can a nation which tolerates and supports such a system be blessed of God?
17. What can we do to help in the warfare against this great evil?

LESSON NOTES.

Each of the pagan gods had besides the public and open, a secret worship paid to him to which none were admitted but those who had been selected by preparatory ceremonies called initiation. This ancient worship was termed the mysteries.—Mackey.

A most solemn method of confirming an oath in the mysteries was by placing a drawn sword against the throat of the person to whom it was administered, and invoking heaven earth and sea to witness the ratification.—Pierson.

Diogenes derided these mysteries. Socrates would not be initiated into them, and was persecuted to the death. Diagoras, the Melian, was prescribed and had a reward set upon his head; and it nearly cost Eschylus his life for speaking of them too freely in one of his tragedies.—Phelps Secret Societies Ancient and Modern.

TEMPERANCE.

—The city of Millville supported some twenty grog-shops some twenty years ago, and drunkenness abounded on every hand. Eleven years ago the voters elected officers who refused license, and after a hard struggle banished the dram-shops. A population of 8,000 are now sober, prosperous and happy. The glass-factories of Whitall, Tatum & Co., employing 1,500 hands, are located here, and a member of the firm recently said: "Prohibition is worth to us, as a firm, at least ten thousand dollars a year in general regularity of the men at their work."

—The liquor dealers' Advocate laments that "there are over one hundred and fifty prohibition and so-called temperance newspapers flourishing in the United States," and "only three brewers' organs, two distillers' and wholesale dealers', and five retail dealers' newspapers" to champion the cause of individual rights and personal liberty.

—Joseph Cook says, "I proclaim, without fear of contradiction, that there is nothing in the example of our Lord to justify our social drinking customs. Distilled liquors were not known till the year 1150; the progress distillation came into Europe at that date from the Moors. If you swept all distilled liquors out of existence, then you would bring the world into something of the condition in which it stood during the time of our Saviour. I am grieved with indignation. I dare not to express to the full when I hear preachers and church members quoting the example of our Lord in support of the use of distilled liquors, which were not invented until the twelfth century."

—A bill has been introduced in the Pennsylvanian Legislature "To prohibit the manufacture, sale, and use of infernal machines and devices to surreptitiously destroy life and injure property." It is understood that the bill has reference to a firm in Philadelphia where explosives are manufactured and sold and "No questions asked." The bill seems to meet with general approval, notwithstanding its prohibitory feature. We hear nothing in this case about "Personal liberty," "Individual right," or probibition being a failure. Here is a bill the object of which is to prohibit a business heretofore recognized as legitimate—a bill which, if passed, will destroy valuable property and at the same time provide for no compensation. What has become of those members in the legislature whose keen sense of justice prevent them from favoring the submission of the prohibitory amendment to a vote of the people, unless compensation is allowed for the losses sustained by liquor dealers? The liquor dealer dispenses his poisons and "No questions asked." "Life is destroyed and property injured." Are not the cases parallel?—Amendment Herald.

MAKING DRUNKENNESS INFAMOUS.

The venerable Rev. Dr. Andrew P. Peabody, late preacher to Harvard University, in a recent letter on the sale and use of intoxicating liquors, says: "I believe that the only remedy for intemperance is to make drunkenness the prime offense, and to bring about a state of public feeling in which drunkenness and all approaches to it shall be looked upon with the same disesteem, loathing and intense moral disapprobation with which the attempt is made to brand the sale of spirituous liquors. Stigmatize the sale and the seller as you please, I care not with how deep a brand, if you will only make one deeper still for those whose vice makes the sale infamous. The most efficient legislation in behalf of temperance would be subjecting intoxication in all cases to ignominious punishment. What the law makes ignominious, society will hold in like disesteem. If a young man of respectable family is liable to be locked up for coming home drunk from a convivial gathering, not only will he be restrained from excessive indulgence, but his parents and friends will be very careful how they start him on the first steps of the evil way. Making drunkenness infamous would do more than all things else toward checking, and to a very large degree entirely preventing the use of strong drink of any kind in families, and on occasions of social festivity, and would multiply beyond any other conceivable cause the number of total abstainers."

THE WOMAN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.

Miss Frances E. Willard is just completing a months' work in California, having visited the leading towns of the State. After completing these engagements Miss Willard, accompanied by her Private Secretary, Miss Anna Gordon, will visit and organize in all the leading cities and towns of Nevada, Oregon, Washington Territory, British Columbia, Montana, Idaho, Utah, Wyoming, Colorado, Nebraska, and Manitoba. This is the tenth year since the organization of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, and its officers purpose to introduce the Society in every county seat and town of ten thousand inhabitants and over, as the best manner of signalizing this epoch in temperance work. The society is now organized in three thousand towns and cities of the United States, and has seventy-five thousand members as its estimated constituency in 1883. Mrs. Lucas, the sister of John Bright, is President of the British W. C. T. U., and Mrs. D. B. Chisholm, of Hamilton, Canada, is President of the Canadian W. C. T. U. Miss Willard and these ladies are in correspondence relative to a simultaneous movement for such an increase in the number of local auxilliaries as will make this the most notable year's organizing ever known in Temperance annals.

tears of the conflict; by all the hopes of a free country and disenthralled race; yea, as a legacy for mankind, let us now secure a free representative republic, based upon an impartial suffrage, and human equality demanded by the Declaration of Independence."

Such is his anti-slavery, Senatorial record. To avoid prolonging this sketch beyond reason, his miscellaneous acts are given in brief.

He voted for 500,000 volunteers, and for money to pay them. He moved the first pension and land bounty bill. He eulogized Gen. Lyon, and put "Springfield" on the banners and caps of two Kansas regiments. He moved and carried a bill for a disabled "Soldiers Home;" advocated equalizing the pay of soldiers; and procured the passage of a large number of soldiers' relief bills.

A forged correspondence has been secretly circulated in Kansas, to prove that Mr. Pomeroy was willing, for money to sell his vote to acquit Andrew Johnson! This is his Senate record on the impeachment. He said: "I cannot vote for acquittal and thus be false to my convictions of duty. With uplifted hand and heart, I declare my belief to be that the President is guilty."

Senator Pomeroy helped pass all the reconstruction acts over Johnson's vetoes. The Homestead Bill was largely his work. He is against taxing women and denying them the ballot; and he proposed to make it criminal to bring liquor into the Capitol building.

In short, during his twelve years, he was ever at his post. He presented bills reducing telegraphic rates, connecting telegraphs with post offices extending them to Holland, for steamship lines to Europe, and advocated railroads to the Pacific and through the Southern States, has supported civil service reform, and he first brought in the bill for the Yellow Stone Park. Indeed, the whole range of national and special legislation has felt his steady and intelligent influence. While his own State of Kansas, at whose birth he was present, has felt his hand through the legislation of Congress in every period of her growth. The record of his Senatorial action would fill a volume; and though, like Garfield, Lincoln and Washington himself, he has been assailed by vicious and mistaken enemies, he has come out of every ordeal, cleared, justified and acquitted by the Senate and the courts, as their records show.

AS OPPONENT OF SECRET SOCIETIES.

He has never belonged to one, and has ever opposed them. In 1869, while Senator, he was in Chicago, and came into our first annual meeting in Farwell Hall; and being invited to speak he came forward and said nearly the following words:

"MR. PRESIDENT, AND RESPECTED FRIENDS:—I sympathize with the general object and spirit of this convention, and am disposed to comply with the request to address you. My public life has been in political rather than religious matters, and I know not if I am a Christian in the special sense, if there is any, of this convention. But I know that when some eleven years of age, I united with a Christian church and I have never gone back on it.

"As to secret societies, I know nothing of their interior. I once went by invitation to make a temperance address, and, when arrived at the door, I was required to give a pledge of secrecy and submit to some sort of initiation before I could go in. This I declined. But we finally compromised the matter by my promising to refrain from publishing what I should see or hear inside at that meeting. And as I saw nothing but the members, and heard nothing but what I said myself, my promise was easily kept.

"But I am opposed to secret obligations in a free country. Where they prevail how is a man to know, when he rises in a court house, but he is addressing a foresworn court and jury? And when it comes to be known that secret obligations, previously assumed, control and decide cases, what is to prevent our court houses sinking into popular contempt?

"When I arrived at Kansas City, I was told that I must join a Masonic lodge or my life was not safe, that the government and laws could not protect me, that I could not go up the river into Kansas, in safety, unless I joined a secret order, some of whom would murder me as a simple citizen of the United States, but would protect me as a member of their order! I chose to take the risk of the government and laws.

"I have said I know nothing of secret societies but what the members tell me. And I have been invited to join by many who have all assured me that they are conducted on the principle of proscription to outsiders, and partiality to those within. I object to this as contrary to the equity and equality on which our government and laws rest. Why should I promise to obey or befriend strangers, men of whom I know nothing but that they possess and can give a secret token or sign?"

He continued in this strain of calm and forcible remark for awhile, and giving us some just and sensible advice, sat down.

The Leavenworth (Kan.) Herald, in less than two weeks, came out with the declaration that Senator Pomeroy had signed his political death warrant. And the lodge from that time has endeavored to make the declaration good.

The Cynosure differs in opinion with the Kansas Herald. It believes that the speech of Senator Pomeroy at Farwell Hall, Chicago, in 1879, part of which is cited above, instead of being his political death warrant, may yet, under God, be one means of making him President of the United States, if not in November, 1884, yet at the Federal election in 1888; and it will do its utmost, if the American party shall concur, to achieve this great object at the first election ensuing.

THE CHURCHES.

—Rev. L. Kent, of the Western Holiness Association, and well known in Illinois for his efforts for a deeper spiritual life among the churches, is holding meetings in the Free Methodist church in South Chicago.

—The Rochester, N. Y., Wesleyan conference has urgently called Bro. C. F. Hawley to labor among the churches composing the body during the coming year.

—After the debate at Morning Sun, Iowa, Elder Rathbun and Bro. M. N. Butler of the American Freeman, spent a few days in Wayne, Henry county, same State, where they organized a Wesleyan class, which desires Elder R. to remain as pastor.

—Rev. George F. Pentecost, who has been preaching for the Tompkins Avenue Congregational church, Brooklyn, for over two years and a half, was installed as pastor last week. The Rev. Drs. E. B. Webb, J. O. Means, and A. J. Gordon, of Boston, and Dwight L. Moody, were among those invited to sit in the ecclesiastical council.

—Six young colored men graduated from Howard University Theological Department lately into the ministry, and will labor among their race in the South, under the care of the Congregational church.

—Bro. G. M. Hardy reports in the Wesleyan a singular case of discipline met at one of the conferences in southern New York. A member who called himself "Happy Harry" was accused of unfaithfulness to his covenant, having visited a lodge of Masons since joining the church. He renounced Masonry, but claimed that the Holy Ghost might send him to the lodge to talk with Masons about their sins and pray with them. Bro. Hardy believes justly that the poor man has not discernment of spirits; but what shall we say of ministers who are of sound mind going into Masonry for a like reason.

—The Christian World tells of a Missionary Society of forty years' existence in the large wholesale and retail dry goods store of Hitchcock & Williams, St. Paul's Churchyard, London. A daily morning prayer meeting is held in the house, and religious services twice on the Sabbath. One of the clerks has become a minister of the Gospel, and another after five years' study has recently gone as a missionary to China. The missionary collections of the young men of the society the past year amounted to $600.

—In our last issue we spoke of the missionary spirit at Hillsdale, Mich., and how it had resulted in 20 going to the work of Foreign Missions. From the Hillsdale Herald, of March 15, we learn that the actual number is 22; and that nearly all of them are still in their Mission fields—only one permanently in the U. S. A. This number of Foreign Missionaries is about five per cent. of this college's whole number of graduates—an example which may well be commended to other colleges and institutions.—Missionary Review.

—A letter to Bro. Doty, of the Christian Harvester, Canton, O., from the Seamen's reading rooms, 19 Lall Bazar, Calcutta, he says: "The work of God among the sailors is simply wonderful. There has seldom been a day since I commenced here but souls have been converted. Sometimes upward of twenty may be seen at our altar. A goodly number have been sanctified wholly. Some have left the sea and are preaching.

—A young physician, H. E. Burbank, member of the Fifty-first St., Free Methodist church of this city writes to the Vanguard in these words of his purpose to go to India as a missionary:

"God has had his hand on me all these many months since I entered the Medical College in September, 1880, leading me on and showing me that eventually he would have me join Bro. and Sister Ward in India. I have endeavored to study the working of the various missionary societies and boards, and also the faith work, and am fully convinced that in any and all places, whether at home or abroad, the true Scriptural method of doing God's work is that based on an intelligent faith in his promises and power. Let any soul meet the conditions and thus be enabled to exercise actual faith, and there is no possibility of failure. The experience and success of the ages past prove this to be a fact. I believe it, and am endeavoring to act on it to the best of my ability. I have some obligations necessarily incurred during my course in college which I must discharge before I can go to India, but I believe God will open up the way for me, and also provide means to set me at work as a Medical Faith Missionary in India. I do not want, nor will I, feeling as I now do, ever be under the direction or control of a secretary or board here at home while I am in India. Machine work of that sort has ruined more missionary efforts than almost any other agency."

—The Hon. David B. Sickles, late United States Consul at Bangkok, Siam, who has enjoyed special opportunities for observing the missionary work among mixed populations, bears the following testimony respecting the results of Christian missions established in heathen countries in the East:

"Our American missionaries, in carrying the Bible into foreign lands, have opened up new avenues for trade, established our flag in distant ports, formed new treaties of friendship and commerce where none existed before, given employment to our merchant marine, taught the English language so as to facilitate commercial transactions, and introduced American books and newspapers. In my opinion they have accomplished more for our Government in extending our influence in the East than all the consuls in the service, and the country could afford to pay them a handsome bounty for their disinterested labors."

—The mission work in the Indian Territory is illustrated by the reply of a civil engineer to the question, "What do you think of the Creeks and Choctaws?" "They are as nice a people as you can find; there seems to be no vice or crime among them. I never knew a people so honest, or so careful in their observance of the Sabbath. They would not even take old fruit cans that were thrown out of the camp, without first asking permission; although, being very fond of pictures, they valued those that were pasted around the cans." The only explanation he could find for their good state of morals was that many or most of their chiefs were ministers.

—The Fiji Islands afford a striking example of what the labors of Christian missionaries have done for the civilization of the world. Less than half a century ago, these islands were the dread of mariners, who, when shipwrecked on their dangerous reefs, invariably fell a prey to cannibals. Forty years ago two Methodist missionaries resolved, at the risk of their lives, to carry the gospel to these savages. Now there are over 500 Christian churches with parochial schools within the limits of Fiji, and these churches are not only self-supporting, but send out missionaries to other South Sea Islands, and the Fiji Islands are a regular repairing station for whalers and trading vessels from all nations.

SECT AND NO SECT.

We reprint the following letter on the no-sect and Christian union doctrine from a late number of the Free Methodist:

WASHINGTON, D. C., N. C. A. Headquarters.

Rev. Joseph Travis,

DEAR BROTHER:—Your good and brotherly letter is in hand, and considered. I am settled in my conviction that an attempt to break up all the sects to cast out sectarism would result in a new sect whose creed is that there should be no sects. And to war on existing churches to cleanse them of their evils; would be burning down the barns to kill the rats in them. I, therefore have never contemplated a new sect. "The Associated Churches of Christ" means, with me, to unite all Christians on the one point of excluding all false, secret, Christless worships—leaving each church denomination to keep up their distinctive modes of work, and consult their own judgment and taste as to their methods. The New Testament churches were more diversified than ours. Some kept Saturday, some Sunday, and some both days. But they were all Christians and so one church. The divisions of the body of Christ into sects is then only evil, when there are rivalries, bickerings and contentions; but these may exist in single churches. I have thought separate names evil, and for myself I eschew them, because they cover and stimulate contentions. But I see no way for me to do but to wait and work and pray "that they all may be one." I am very sure I cannot suppress names and exterminate sects by taking another name and forming a new sect.

I attempt to go no further than I can see duty. I will not recognize Universalists and other unregenerate denyers of the Bible. But wherever I find a living faith in Christ, there I meet a Christian and a brother. But I believe in a "godly discipline," and that Christians must be excommunicated if they adhere to their sins. The Corinthian who was guilty of incest seems to have been a Christian.

I saw in the Cynosure a letter from Bro. Roberts complaining of some things which some one had written concerning the Free Methodists. I did not see the writing complained of. I believe in the adage, "Speak truth or speak nothing, no matter of whom;" and some Free Methodists may have erred somewhere. But our secretary, Mr. Stoddard, assures me that wherever he finds a Free Methodist family he finds a welcome and a home. Such has been my experience.

As to Rev. J. S. T. Milligan's proposition for a "national council of churches," opposed to the "unfruitful works of darkness," I see no possible evil in adopting and carrying it out. Two Free Methodist preachers, Fanning and Underwood, came to my house in 1867 and moved me to write a call for the Aurora convention in October. This action of those two preachers has resulted in the national movement. I think the effect on all denominations has, thus far, been benign. Mr. Milligan's proposition contemplates but one meeting of council. There was but one at Jerusalem about circumcision, because the Judaizing ritualists, who wished to inaugurate a set of half-Jewish rites for Christians, were put down. It may and it may not, be necessary and desirable to hold other councils, unless the lodge-viper shall be shaken off; but I am in favor of one grand national "council of churches," to testify for Christ against the Baal-worship.

Years ago when you met with our executive committee at 88 LaSalle street, you said to us: "All the true reforms must eventually crystalize around this." I have quoted that remark of yours hundreds of times since. Your affectionate brother,

J. BLANCHARD.

BREVITIES.

Asa C. Tuttle has brought twenty-seven Indian children to Wabash, Indiana, to be educated in White's Manual Labor Institute near that place. They represent nine different tribes.

Rowland Hill rode a great deal, and by exercise preserved vigorous health. On one occasion, when asked by a medical friend what physician and apothecary he employed, to be always so well, he replied, "My physician has been a horse, and my apothecary an ass."

Mr. Sargent, director of the botanic garden and arboretum of Harvard College, calculates that there are 200,000 acres of unimproved land in Massachusetts which could at once be covered with larch plantations with advantage, and that if so planted their net yield in fifty years would be considerably more than $1,000,000,000.

J. Edwin Sherman, metallurgist, of Boston, has just concluded a series of experiments upon a new metal, recently discovered by him, with a view to ascertaining its fitness, as compared with other metals, for telegraph wire. The experiments, it is said, show that wire made of this metal has great tenacity, does not rust, and is superior in point of conductivity to any wire now used for electrical purposes. Metal, which has nearly the specific gravity and somewhat the appearance of silver, can be produced, it is said, at a cost of five cents a pound.

The Census Office has published a report on the production of bituminous coal, from which it appears that the total amount mined in the United States during the census year 1880 was 42,420,580 tons, of which a total of 29,842,240 tons were produced in the Appalachian coalfield. Allegheny county, Pennsylvania, furnishes over one-tenth, and the States Pennsylvania, Illinois, and Ohio nearly three-fourths of the product. The average price per ton at the mine in 1880 was $1.22, while iv 1870 it was $1.92, at a cost of 88 cents. An average of 431 tons was raised per man, and 7 per cent of the year's working time, or about twenty days per man was lost in strikes. The anthracite production was 28,646,996 tons—nearly all furnished by the State of Pennsylvania—making a total product of the country for the census year 71,067,576 tons. England produced 146,618,122 tons in the same year.

The Abbe Moigno advocates the promotion of a joint stock company, with the view of exploring the bottom of the Red Sea, and especially the bitter water lakes. In a German account of the project it is justly described as "one of the boldest." "It is nothing less," continues the writer, "than to search the bottom of the Red Sea to discover there the proof of that great event narrated by Moses 3,000 years ago. To provide the needful funds to carry ou excavations which would have for their result the restoration to light of the remains of the Egyptian armies engulfed in the Red Sea, with the chariots, horses, arms, treasures, archieves, and perhaps the king himself—that Pharaoh who was conquered by Moses—this will indeed be a noble enterprise. Buried in the masses of salt of the bitter lakes, concealed at different places by thick belts of salt, these historical remains are perhaps in a state of preservation unexpected by us." The Abbe estimates the cost of the excavations at 300,000 francs, and against expenditures he places uothing in the way of possible returns.—St. James Gazette.

Though dynamite has but lately come into notoriety and wide use, it is not, as many think, a recent invention. Its explosive power was discovered nearly forty years ago by Ascagne Sobrero, who was studying chemistry in the laboratory of Pelouze. After numerous experiments, Sobrero made explosives from dextrine, mannite, cane sugar, and glycerine, and created a sensation in the scientific world. But the new force was found to be so dangerous, with a tendency to premature discharge, that few undertook to utilize it. About 1864 Henry and Alfred Nobel, practical mining engineers, began experiments with nitro-glycerine, and were so well satisfied that they immediately took out patents as discoverers, though the honor belonged to Sobrero. Dynamite, generally made of rotton stone and nitro-glycerine, was patented in the United States May 26, 1868, by Alfred Nobel The process of the manufacture is exceedingly simple, though not without hazard. Nitric and sulphuric acid, mixed in certain proportions with glycerine, make nitro-glycerine, which, put with some absorbent material—fuller's earth or rotton stone—makes dynamite. No wonder the Irish and Russians are able to get up in such quantities and with such secrecy.

HON. THURLOW WEED ON THE MORGAN ABDUCTION.

This is a sixteen page pamphlet comprising a letter written by Mr. Weed, and read at the unveiling of the monument erected to the memory of Capt. William Morgan. The frontispiece is an engraving of the monument. It is a history of the unlawful seizure and confinement of Morgan in the Canandaigua jail, his subsequent conveyance by Freemasons to Fort Niagara, and drowning in Lake Ontario. He not only subscribes his NAME to the letter, but ATTACHES HIS AFFIDAVIT to it.

In closing his letter he writes: I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the "Anti-Masonic excitement" by a sincere desire, first, to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next, to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of "secret societies."

The pamphlet is well worth perusing, and is doubtless tholast historical article which this great journalist and politician wrote. [Chicago, National Christian Association.] Single copy, 5 cents.

FARM NOTES.

ORCHARD CULTURE.

A practical fruit grower gives the following as his system on orchard management: In three years I improved the production of my fruit trees from 15 to 200 bushels by treating them in the following manner: I first reduced the top one-fourth, then in the fall I plowed the soil as well as I could, it being quite rocky, and turned a short furrow toward the trees. As I worked from them I let the plow fall a little lower, and when between the trees I allowed the plow to run deep, so that the water would settle away from them in the spring. I hauled a fair quantity of coarse manure, pulverized it well and marked out hills, manuring each hill. I planted corn and beans and pumpkins. The following spring I repeated the same cultivation. My trees began to grow very fast, and that fall I harvested 70 bushels of very good apples. The following spring I manured for the third time; planted it to potatoes, which grew very large but rotted badly. I made up the loss, however, by harvesting 200 bushels of large fruit. I changed the production of a yellow belleflower tree from three-fourths of a bushel to seven bushels, and sold them for $1.25 per bushel, which I think a very good return for my labor. From my experience, I am of the opinion that most trees have too much top for the amount of roots, and a deficiency of nourishment for puoducing a developed fruit. I like fall or winter pruning. Always cover the cut with grafting wax or thick paint. After removing the limbs by thinning out the center of the tree it has a tendency to grow broad. Too many varieties are bad.

PREPARE FOR DROUTHS.

The dimunition in milk superinduced by summer drouths is one of the farmer's drawbacks. The check in the flow of milk is sometimes felt throughout the entire season, even if favorable weather shall afterwards ensue, for when cows once fall off in their milk, it is hard work to bring them up again at this advauced stage of their yearly-giving period. Such a loss may be avoided by taking the precaution of sowing a small field of corn adjoining the pasture, or in some place where it will be convenient to feed. If sown at the usual time of planting corn, it will be large enough to use by the middle of July. Another piece may be sown later, for feeding in August. This will be found cheap and good food for milch cows, on account of its extraordinary succulence. Sorghum and millet are also good, but the corn for a soiling crop is better. On moist soils it flourishes during a drouth, when everything else suffers. The cattle can be fed in the pasture, lane, or yard, at regular hours. An acre or two will often help out wonderfully in this way, and that which is not needed for feeding during the summer, can be cut and cured for winter use.—W. D. B. in American Agriculturist for May.

ANIMAL EXERCISE.

The exercise of animals ensures a superior quality of flesh. If not, how is it that the beef of Scotch highland and Welsh mountain black cattle is more delicate and of a finer flavor than that of those reared and fed on lowlands, or in yards and stalls, and brings two cents more per pound in the market? It is chiefly because they take much more exercise while reared and fattened, which acts upon the muscles, and increases their tenderness and juicincss? The mutton of the Welsh mountain sheep is so superior to all others, even the famous Southdown, that it is all engaged beforehand by private parties at a high price, and is never offered to the public in market. It is true that the pasture they feed on has a sort of aromatic taste, and assists in helping to flavor the mutton; but still we think the exercise is an important factor in contributing to its superiority. The venison of wild deer is much more gamy than of those which are kept tame in large herds in gentlemen's parks, and the flavor of wild grouse, partridges, and quail is much preferred to that of domestic fowls, on account of its gamy quality. Poultry, when closely confined to fatten, instead of distributing the fat in small streaks through the flesh, lay it up in lumps on different parts of the body, leaving the flesh flabby and comparatively tasteless. We contend for giving all animals plenty of fresh air and a reasonable amount of exercise, in addition to wholesome food and pure water. Then they thrive well, and turn out a good and profitable quality of meat. —American Agriculturist for May.

TREATMENT OF BALKY HORSES.

A society for the prevention of cruelty to animals recommends the following rules for the treatment of balky horses.

1. Pat the horse upon the neck, examine the harness carefully first on one side and then on the other, speak encouragingly while doing so, then jump into the wagon and give the word go; generally he will obey.

2. A teamster in Maine says he can start the worst balky horse by taking him out of the shafts and making him go round in a circle. If the first dance of this kind does not cure him the second will be sure to do it.

3. To cure a balky horse simply place your hand over the horse's nose and shut off the wind till he wants to go; then let him go.

4. The brains of horses seem to entertain but one idea at a time; thus continued whipping only confirms his stubborn resolve. If you can by any means give him a new subject to think of you will have no trouble in starting him. A simple remedy is to take a couple of turns of stout twine around the fore leg, just below the knee, and tie in a bow knot. At the first check he will go dancing off, and after going a short distance you can get out remove the string, to prevent injury in your further drive.

There are possibilities for the cow which the unreflecting world has never dreamed of. A farmer at Gridley, Cal., hunts wild geese with a 3-year-old heifer. He has trained the animal to walk out to where a flock of geese have settled down, browsing all the way along, he walking alongside on the off side from the geese, and when near enough the cow lies down, and he shoots into the flock and captures thirty or forty.

ANCIENT LAW MAKERS.

☞About the beginning of the Fifth Century, the Salians, after their settlement in Gaul, under their King, Pharamond, they framed a body of laws which have since been known as Salic; but at that time those law-makers knew nothing of the wonderful discovery which works harmoniously with nature's laws, and which is a positive boon to those suffering from Rheumatism, Gout or Neuralgia. We refer to that common sense remedy, Salicylica.

DR. JOHN BULL'S

Smith's Tonic Syrup

FEVER and AGUE

Or CHILLS and FEVER.

AND ALL MALARIAL DISEASES.

The proprietor of this celebrated medicine justly claims for it a superiority over all remedies ever offered to the public for the SAFE, CERTAIN, SPEEDY and PERMANENT cure of Ague and Fever, or Chills and Fever, whether of short or long standing. He refers to the entire Western and Southern country to bear him testimony to the truth of the assertion that in no case whatever will it fail to cure if the directions are strictly followed and carried out. In a great many cases a single dose has been sufficient for a cure, and whole families have been cured by a single bottle, with a perfect restoration of the general health. It is, however, prudent, and in every case more certain to cure, if its use is continued in smaller doses for a week or two after the disease has been checked, more especially in difficult and long-standing cases. Usually this medicine will not require any aid to keep the bowels in good order. Should the patient, however, require a cathartic medicine, after having taken three or four doses of the Tonic, a single dose of BULL'S VEGETABLE FAMILY PILLS will be sufficient.

The genuine SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP must have DR. JOHN BULL'S private stamp on each bottle. DR. JOHN BULL only has the right to manufacture and sell the original JOHN J SMITH'S TONIC SYRUP, of Louisville, Ky. Examine well the label on each bottle. If my private stamp is not on each bottle do not purchase, or you will be deceived.

BUSINESS.

It is a pleasure to speak of the encouraging features of our reform work and especially so of the increasc in the number of our readers. We have not realized a "boom," but steady growth has been the rule and only a small number have withdrawn from our list. Our patrons have set us a good example by not "grumbling and finding fault" which we have endeavored to imitate. There are a few people in the world who seem to get a bad start and to stand "edgewise" all the way through, who never turn a "fair side" to friend or fellow until they make the "last turn" at the "Gate ajar," but fortunately from such we have largely escaped. We hope "to hew to the line," avoid discourteous personalities, merit and receive the increased patronage of those who love the truth, and report YOUR paper on a sound basis with a paying list before the autumn leaves turn yellow in the early frosts. Will you help as you have opportunity?

NOTES ON THE WEEK.

The Railway Exposition which is to open in the Inter-state Exposition building in this city on Thursday and continue a month, promises to be one of the most important exhibitions of the year. Chicago is the greatest railway center of the world, and Illinois has more miles of railway than any other State of the Union. Railways have contributed as much as any other human agency to the commercial importance of both. The effort to make this exhibition worthy of the railway business will leave nothing undone that could contribute to the success of the undertaking. The greatest locomotive is sent by the Southern Pacific road, the most complete trains by another Western line, and from England is expected the Rocket, the first successful locomotive, which proved its constructor, George Stevenson, to be the first of engineers.

The bridge over the East river connecting New York and Brooklyn is to be formally opened to the public on Thursday of this week and the event is to partake somewhat of a national character,—not because of its height, for others are more than 135 feet above water; nor its length for others are more than a mile and one-seventh long. But there are few which surpass it in magnificent proportions, in engineering skill, in the importance of its connections, in the immense traffic it must sustain, and especially in its cost, which is put down at $14,527,000. Perhaps none have ever been made so much account of in politics, nor was ever such a singular quarrel raised over the dedication of such a structure. Thursday is, in the order of Providence, the birthday of Queen Victoria, whom most civilized people have learned to esteem most highly both as a woman and a queen. Hence those Irishmen who though in America have nothing American in their convictions, and the politicians who care for nothing like an Irish vote, demanded that some other day for the opening be selected, and threats of blowing up the structure followed a refusal. Finally some one remembered that an obscure police justice, once treasurer of the Land League, was born on the same day and the irate Irishmen consented that this propitious fact should balance the other, and the two cities will be allowed to celebrate their bridge in peace.

Another week of cyclones is making ærological history pretty fast. Southern Michigan and the line between Wisconsin and Illinois have been furrowed with these plow-shares of whirlwind, crushing through the city of Racine with dreadful fatality. As this is the first visitation of the lake shore district by these storms, the confidence of many in the protection of the saturated atmosphere of the lake is gone. It has been long supposed that the atmospheric conditions were so different here from the inland regions that cyclones need never be feared. The experience of Racine proves otherwise; and that of Kansas City the week before demonstrates that districts built up strongly with brick or stone are just as liable to destruction as any other. Indeed, so far as any one can say, a tornado would be just as reckless through the middle of Chicago or St. Louis as on an open prairie. When Chicago burned down, awe-stricken at the unexpected calamity, we confessed the hand of God; may not the same power send a blast to blow down our palaces of pride? The increasing frequency of these storms year by year must suggest many speculations. It is true that twenty years ago they were of very rare occurrence. What changes of climate or atmospheric conditions are going on? What influences arise from the settlement of the country? or is it true that we are subjected to the influences of the heavenly bodies? These storms are generally attended with peculiar electrical phenomena, some are like pillars of cloud capped with fire and charged with sulphur. Can it be that as the country is settled there is such an increase of malaria that these furious agents are sent out to dispel it? Such storms must certainly purify the air, and they are certainly less fatal than a pestilence; and it is true that we yet understand little of their origin and use in the economy of nature.

The government is beginning to give attention to the methods taken by the English government to relieve the distresses of Ireland. One of these seems to be sending over ship-loads of paupers and dumping them without a word upon our wharves. Six hundred such poor Irish were lately landed in Boston and sent West. At Albany their wretched and impoverished condition was discovered and they were stopped on their journey and fed by the citizens. Another cargo of 800 is on the way. These emigrants are almost penniless, rendered so by the long exactions of their landlords. The only assistance they receive from the government is their transportation. This is a considerable gift to a pauper, but it would certainly be more creditable if British generosity could throw in "forty acres and a mule." It is at least poor return for the hearty assistance sent from our shores in times of Irish famine. Bismarck, grim and despotic though he may be, does better. He has been seriously objecting to German emigration to this country, but it is said that he has planned a great scheme for German colonies in Mexico, and is as negotiating for ten million acres of land for them, one-tenth of which is already purchased.

"There is a sore evil which I have seen under the sun," says the Preacher (Ec. 5: 13), "namely, riches kept for the owners thereof to their hurt." Are Vanderbilt and Gould beginning to realize this evil also? One of these men has retired from the control of his immense railway enterprises, putting the business in the hands of his sons and trusted servants; the other has sold one of his New York dailies, the World, and is putting his railway bonds upon the market. It is said that these two men have accumulated three hundred millions of dollars. Having swallowed down riches are they ready, as Job says, to vomit them up again? It is true their wealth cannot buy everything. Gould applied the other day for membership in a Boston yacht club (he has just built a famous yacht), but lo! the great man of Wall street was blackballed. Would that both these men could realize that their wealth can minister neither to their ambition nor pleasure long. They may yet use it so as to receive it again with interest from the treasury of heaven.

ODD-FELLOWSHIP MORALS.

BY E. D. BAILEY.

"Odd-fellowship is a moral, not a religious organization."—Sovereign Grand Lodge.

"It assumes, also, as a cardinal office, an earnest and unintermitting care for the moral health of its membership."—Idem.

"It is unfortunate for our order, and for not a few of its members, that too much prominence has been generally given to its feature of pecuniary benefits. * * This, though a laudable and useful trait in our operations, is hardly a tithe of our aims and objects. By this undue prominence of the pecuniary relief afforded, even our own members have had their attention and efforts greatly withdrawn from the moral and social influences which the order is so eminently calculated to promote."—Grosh's Manual, p. 78.

"The duties taught him (i. e., the candidate) and the lessons inculcated throughout the progress he may make in the order, will tend, if he be true to his nature, to his moral and intellectual advancement and consequently to his happiness."—Odd-fellow's Pocket Companion, p. 24.

These authorities all claim that a leading object of Odd-fellowship is the moral training of its members. It is therefore a matter of public concernment what kind of morals are taught. In another article we have shown that the charity or pecuniary benefits of the order are no advantage, as the average cost of initiation and dues so far exceed the average benefit. It is the purpose of this article to prove that the order is no moral benefit to its members or the community.

It will be noticed that the Sovereign Grand Lodge, as quoted above, distinctly affirms that the order is moral, not religious. Precisely what is meant by this declaration? Can good morals and pure religion be divorced? Evidently the the Grand Lodge does not, mean to affirm that there are no religious ceremonies in the order. This would be plainly contrary to fact, for the order has a chaplain, prayers and hymns. The meaning must be that the order does not claim to teach religious duties but moral duties—a distinction which many vainly attempt to establish, but which does not exist in fact, for good morals are a part of pure religion and pure religion is a part of good morals. The distinction is asserted by secret orders to mislead the public in its examination of the bearing of these orders upon the Christian religion.

The first element in any perfect system of morals embraces our duties to our God. Does Odd-fellowship include instruction on this point? If it does not, then the very foundation of good moral instruction is wanting. There can be no healthy moral sentiment which does not recognize as paramount our duties to God, i. e., our religious duties. There is a creed, known as the moralist's creed, which ignores entirely the first table of the law in which are set forth the duties of creatures to their Creator. Christian teachers are constantly contending against this class of moralists and affirming to them the Saviour's declaration, "One thing thou lackest" and that one thing is the most vital of all. Now does the Grand Lodge claim that Odd-fellowship simply teaches the moralist's creed—our duties to our fellow men but not our duties to God? If this be the doctrine—and it would seem to be—then every Christian should flee from the order, since it countenances the worldly man's creed, which has been and is a snare to thousands, deluding them into the belief that they are doing their whole duty, when in fact they are doing only half and that too the less important half.

But if the Odd-fellows take another course and affirm (inconsistently of course) that they are not religious but that they do teach men to obey God, then we have a perfect right to examine their position toward Jesus Christ, who is God manifest in the flesh, to ascertain whether their teaching is such as a Christian can endorse. In another article this subject will be examined and it will be demonstrated that the teachings of the order are theistic, or in other words that they do not teach our religious duties according to the Word of God, but according to the pagan idea which makes deity an undefined, unrevealed being or thing, and does not recognize the claims of Jesus Christ.

It becomes apparent at once that an institut which is false to God is not a safe conservator of the morals of the people. The immorality which exists in the world originated with defective religious instruction and practices and it follows as a matter of course, if Odd-fellowship does not teach the only pure and undefiled religion, that it will injure and not benefit its members and the community. This is our first answer to the claim of the Sovereign Grand Lodge. Gentlemen: Your system starts wrong, If you ignore religion altogether you must inevitably demoralize your members. If, on the other hand you teach false religion, you will demoralize them. But if you teach true religion it will not be Odd-fellowship but Christianity, and if you teach Christianity, the lodge, which Christ never authorized, will give place to the church which he established! Happy were it for us all if this were the outcome.

Having thus shown the mistake of the lodge at the very outset, let us look more minutely into its so-called moral teaching. Now let the reader bear in mind that we shall not here or elsewhere claim that Odd-fellowship instructs its members plainly to lie, cheat, commit adultery, get drunk, swear or break the Sabbath. On the contrary many words of wise counsel are given to the candidate in his progress through the order and if nothing were said or done to destroy the effect of such advice we could not object to it, as far as it goes. The writer knew once a profane, drinking, immoral man, who used to give his sons good advice on certain occasions, but the neighbors did not on that account consider him a safe moral guide for the youth of the community. There may be many good things said in the lodge but there are other bad ones said and done which go far to destroy the good that might otherwise have been done.

The lodge originated in an English grog-shop and was first got up to while away the time of idlers. The initiation of a candidate furnished fun for the boys, and the conviviality was its chief attraction. The very name, Odd-fellow, shows some such origin and design. The historian of the order says this about the early habits of the members:

"Meeting, as they did, in public houses of not the most select character, the only places open to men of their humble pretensions and limited means, the beer-mug, the pipe and the toast circulated freely, as the song and jest excited their mirth and hilarity; until by frequent repetition, calling for increased indulgence, it is no wonder that the noble objects of their meetings were too frequently made but secondary to mere sensual gratifications."—Grosh's Manual, p. 23.

With such an origin and such habits of course the order could not command the respect of any persons whose presence would give it dignity. Hence at a later period some restrictions were placed on its convivial habits and its beneficiary purposes were reduced to a system and denominated charity. The same general features, however, remain and a leading purpose of its meetings is to have a good time—at least so its members frequently say.

The habit of concealment which is taught by its repeated oaths of secrecy, the mode of initiation, the incongruous mixture of the sublime and the ridiculous, the robes, masks, coffin, skeleton, chain, hoodwink, and darkened room, mixed up with the pretended moral and religious talk about death, brotherhood and other themes, are devices which no one but the devil could think of using to improve the morals of young men. The whole transaction is itself an immorality. As well open a saloon, drug the candidate with liquor to make a fool of him and all the while talk temperance to him and call it a temperance society, as to violate all decency and refinement and honesty to teach the opposite virtues to a candidate.

Did our Lord ever recommend such a process for the reformation of the world? He also came to improve the morals of the people. Did he commence by pledging them to secrecy? Did he put a hoodwink on their eyes? Did he threaten them with death and put a chain over their necks? Did he lead them to a coffin with a human skeleton in it in a darkened room? Did he clothe his disciples in robes and put masks on their faces? If these are valuable ways of seeking and saving the lost, why should he have said nothing in secret; why should he have said "Swear not at all;" why should he have come into the light and called the people out of darkness; why, in short, did he resort to methods in every respect the opposite of those employed by Odd-fellows? If his ways are not the best we may seek others, but if they are the best let Christian men not be beguiled into the follies of human methods which bear the marks of Satanic origin.

The use made of Scripture passages, of parables, historical events and symbols, is immoral because blasphemous. To misappropriate the Scriptures is itself demoralizing. Such, for illustration, is the use of the Bible narrative of David and Jonathan, the dramatizing of the Good Samaritan parable, or the misappropriation of the Brazen Serpent symbol. The use of these sacred things leads many into the belief that the order teaches the Bible, when in fact it steals from the Bible to glorify itself. It puts forth these lessons as lessons of Odd-fellowship instead of crediting them to our God who gave them to us.

The attempt to unite in a close bond of brotherhood the moral and the immoral, the good and the bad, the sober man and the drunkard, the believer and the unbeliever, the man in whom is the light of truth and the man in whom is darkness, the Christian and the non-Christian—this attempt destroys the morality of the order. It is readily conceded that in the world we cannot get away from wicked men, but we can avoid yoking ourselves to them. The Christian who becomes an Odd-fellow is "unequally yoked together with unbelievers." If his lodge wishes to have a dance, a theatre, or card-playing, the Christian cannot prevent it for the majority favor it—he is unequal to them, but is bound by them. Paul strictly forbids brotherhood with the evil-minded. "But now I have written unto you NOT TO KEEP COMPANY, if any man that is CALLED A BROTHER be a fornicator, or covetous, or an idolator, or a railer, or a drunkard, or an extortioner." 1 Cor. 5:11.

It cannot be claimed by the most enthusiastic Odd-fellow that the lodge teaches any code of morals superior to Christ's. Few will even claim that it is equal to it. Why then should Christians countenance a rival institution to the church of Jesus Christ, which excels in no respect but is every way inferior to it? If the teachings of Christ are better than those of Odd-fellowship then wisdom would require you to abandon that which is inferior and cleave to Christ alone.

THE MORAL WARFARE.

When Freedom, on her natal day,
Within her war-rocked cradle lay,
An iron race around her stood,
Baptized her infant brow in blood;
And through the storm which round her swept.
Their constant ward and watching kept.

Our fathers to their graves have gone;
Their strife is past, their triumph won;
But sterner trials wait the race
Which rises in their honored place,
A moral warfare with the crime
A folly of an evil time.

So let it be, in God's own might
We gird us for the coming fight,
And strong in Him whose cause is ours
In conflict with unholy powers,
We grasp the weapons He has given,
The Light, and Truth, and Love of heaven.

THE PENSION LIST.

BY GEN'L. J. W. PHELPS.

Like breeds like. The privileged order of Freemasons that has been in power for many years has brought upon us an unnecessarily large, privileged class of pensioners.

In granting pensions for meritorious yet unfortunate service, there are two things to be considered:

First, the merit of the individual.

Second, the establishment of a privileged body of men, many of whom are frauds, and who are to receive money from burdened tax-payers, rain or shine, under any circumstances whatever. All other persons are to run the risk of ill-fortune, ill-seasons, ill-adventures in trade, etc., etc., while the pensioner is exempt from every vicissitude. He belongs to a privileged class, which is out of accord with republican government.

The proper thing to be done with men who have suffered loss of physical ability in the public service is to estimate the amount of loss in dollars and cents as far as possible, and then have the amount paid over in a specific sum. Thus, where a man receives eight dollars a month, give him sixteen hundred dollars, or a sum which, put out at interest at six per cent. would give him ninety-six dollars a year, and thus abolish the pension list entirely. One billion of dollars would probably enable the government to get rid of the pensioner class.

A large portion of our pensioners are just as able to take care of money and invest it as other persons are; and why should they be exempted from those vicissitudes of fortune in the investment of money which are common to the laboring masses of the country? Let us suppose that these pensioners have half done their work; that many of them have done no work at at all; that some of them have been hindrances instead of helps; that they have all served contractors and millionaires more than they have the people; that their loose, half-done service has contributed to weaken faith, integrity, and honesty by which all business transactions are rendered uncertain; now why should these pensioners be secured against their own faults and be the recipients of assured incomes, while others, who support them, are subject to all kinds of insecurity in their investments and business transactions?

In estimating our public debt it is understated by the amount of a principle the interest of which would be necessary to pay the pensions allowed to soldiers. At the rate in which the nation is now paying pensions, and which is likely to be increased, our public debt is probably three billions of dollars. It would be better to appropriate the public lands to lump sums for buying off pensioners, than to continue an odious system of inequality and privilege, especially if these lands are to be given to railroad companies.

So far as the merit of the individual pensioner is concerned, the Republic cannot dispense with a proper return for his loss in its service; but in order to insure justice in this direction, there is no need of burdening the Republic with the uncongenial system of a privileged class of men. It is a system which is as dangerous to national liberty as it is to personal independence. The Republic in discharging its war obligations ought not to burden itself with an association or privileged institution that is hostile to its character.

THE OATH OF THE JESUITS.

OBERLIN, O.

It flashed upon me a few days since, that the Jesuit was at the bottom of the associations and dynamiting in Europe, and that his oath corresponded to them. Accordingly I turned to the oath as given by Rev. T. B. Forbush in reply to Richard Gilmour, D. D., Roman Catholic Bishop of the Cleveland Diocese, in his Lenten Pastoral Letter of 1873, and found that it answered to those associations and criminal proceedings very well. I therefore send it for the Cynosure. And whether it shows that the Jesuits are the real parties now moving the Old World by their horrors, or not, it will do to place in your columns to compare with the Masonic oath which bears so great a resemblance to it. Certain it is that what the Jesuits swear is just what is now going on across the Atlantic under the names of Fenian, Socialist, Nihilist, Communist, Black Hand, etc.

Bear in mind that if the Jesuits are at the bottom of the troubles over the sea, society would nowhere be permitted to hear their name pronounced, unless, indeed, their enemy snuffing the scent from the breeze, should give the cry, "The Jesuit!" and reveal the real plotters against human welfare in Europe. To have pursued any other course at this crisis than to forbid the followers of Loyala to mention their name, the General of their order would have been defeated in advance. No; the Jesuits must not announce themselves. Their silence at this point is golden, as is silence among the Freemasons.

Their oath, purports to be in "the presence of Almighty God," where the oath of the Freemasons purports also to be. After the presence of Almighty God, it purports to be in the presence also of Mary, Michael the Archangel, John the Baptist, Peter, Paul, "and all the saints and hosts of heaven,"—a grand array, indeed, of witnesses!

Their oath then exhibits that it is affirmed to the "Ghostly Father," the General of the Jesuits, and what is affirmed is, that the Pope is Christ's Vicar General, is the true and only head of the Roman Catholic church throughout the earth," and has "power to depose heretical kings, princes, states, commonwealths and governments, and that these are all illegal without his sacred confirmation," and "may safely be destroyed." Is that not swearing? Think. Their oath teaches the poor blind Jesuit, thus made a candidate for high orders in Jesuitry, just as their oath teaches the miserably poor blind Freemason thus too made a candidate for high orders in Freemasonry, not that he may destroy, for example, the government of the United States—that were a mere matter of course—but that he may destroy the government "safely." Lying to the candidate in their oath then, has been carried over from the Beast to the Image in the Masonic institution.

What is the result to the Jesuit of this teaching of their oath that "kings, princes, states and governments," which the Pope has not sacredly confirmed, "may safely be destroyed?"

First, his purpose "to the utmost of his power" to defend the Pope's rites and customs against all usurpers of any heretical or Protestant authority whatever," "especially against the pretended authority of the Government and the Church of England, and all their adherents, as usurpal, heretical and opposed to the sacred mother Church of Rome."

Second, his "renouncing and disowning any allegiance due to Protestants, or obedience to any of their inferior magistrates or officers." And herein is seen another feature of the Beast which has been carried over into the Masonic Image. I refer to the same renunciation of allegiance to government ceremoniously inculcated in that sentiment of the lodge placing the Masonic oath above the oath due from every citizen in the courts of his country.

Third, his regarding "the doctrines of the Church of England, the Calvinists, the Huguenots, and others of the name of Protestants damnable," and "that themselves are damned, and to be damned that will not forsake the same."

Fourth, his committal to "help, assist, and advise all or any of his Holiness' agents in whatever place he shall be, in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or in any other territory or kingdom he shall come to." Cardinal McClosky, for example, in New York.

Fifth, his committal to the "utmost to extirpate heretical Protestant doctrine and destroy all their power, regal or otherwise."

Sixth, his committal, "notwithstanding he is dispensed with to assume any heretical religion for the propogation of the mother church's interest, to keep sacred and private all her agent's counsels from time to time as they entrust them to him, and will not divulge them directly or indirectly by any word, writing, or circumstance whatsoever, but will execute all that shall be proposed, given in charge, or discovered unto him by his Ghostly Father, or any of his sacred convent." Herein again, in swearing not to divulge the secrets of the order is seen another feature of the Beast that has been carried over into the structure of the Masonic Image.

Seventh, his swearing all this horrible mass of crime by the "Blessed Trinity," as the oath calls it, and sacrament, which he now receives, performs, and is to keep inviolably, and his "calling all the heavenly and glorious hosts of heaven to witness his real intentions to keep this vow."

THE OATH.

Mr. Forbush says it was "furnished him by the late Dr. Dalley of Rochester, N. Y., where it was used in a controversy with Bishop McQuaid, the Bishop not denying its validity and that there is a standing reward of one thousand dollars to any one who will disprove it." I copy it verbatim:

"I now, in the presence of Almighty God, the blessed Virgin Mary, the blessed Michael the Archangel, the blessed St. John the Baptist, the holy apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, and all the saints and hosts of heaven, and to you, Ghostly Father, declare from my heart, without mental reservation, that his holiness, Pope ——, is Christ's Vicar General, and the true and only head of the Roman Catholic Church throughout the earth, and by virtue of the keys of binding and loosing, given to His Holiness by my Saviour Jesus Christ, he hath power to depose heretical kings, princes, states, commonwealths, governments, all being illegal without his sacred confirmation, and may safely be destroyed. Therefore, to the utmost of my power, I shall and will defend this doctrine of his Holiness's rites and customs against all usurpers of the heretical (or Protestant) authority whatever, especially against the pretended authority and Church of England and all adherents; regard that they and she be usurpal and heretical, opposing the sacred mother Church of Rome. I do renounce and disown any allegiance due to Protestants, or obedience to any of their inferior magistrates or officers. I do further declare that the doctrines of the Church of England, the Calvinists, Huguenots and others of the name of Protestants, to be damnable, and they themselves are damned and to be damned that will not forsake the same. I do further declare that I will help, assist and advise all or any of His Holiness' agents, in whatever place I shall be, in England, Scotland, or Ireland, or in any other territory or kingdom I shall come to and do my utmost to extripate heretical Protestant doctrine, and to destroy all their pretended power, regal or otherwise. I do further promise and declare that notwithstanding I am dispensed with, to assume any religion heretical for the propogation of the mother church's interest, to keep sacred and private all her agent's counsels from time to time as they intrust them to me, and not to divulge them directly or indirectly, by word, writing or circumstance whatsoever, but to execute all that shall be proposed, given in charge or discovered unto me by you, my ghostly father, or any of his sacred convent. All of which I do swear by the Blessed Trinity, and the Blessed Sacrament, which I am now to receive, to perform and on my part to keep inviolably, and do call all the heavenly and glorious host of heaven to witness these my real intentions and to keep this my vow.

In testimony hereof, I take this most holy and blessed Sacrament of the Eucharist and witness the same further with my hand and seal in the face of this holy convent, this day of —— Anno Domini ——. C.

QUESTIONS IN MORAL PHILOSOPHY.

Mr. Oaks Ames becomes active in bribing members of Congress and inducing them to make money out of the public lands which those members hold in trust for the people; and by this means puts enormous sums of money into the pockets of friends, which ought to have gone into the National Treasury. And another Massachusetts man, viz.: Gen'l. Butler, is believed to have made a large fortune while in the public service.

Now the question is:

First. Is it at all probable that Massachusetts would have made one of these men governor and white-washed the other unless the State had become thoroughly imbued with the spurious morality of the Masonic lodge?

Second. Has the Masonic lodge any more of a moral right to absolve men from their crimes than the Romish Confessional has?

Third. Is there any moral difference between lodge-Jesuitry and Romish Jasuitry?

Fourth. Is there not as much money paid out in Massachusetts for the support of the lodge as there is for the support of the church?

Fifth. Where Masonry is ancient and honorable, are not bribery, breach of trust, defalcation, etc., great and shining virtues?

ODD-FELLOWSHIP CLAIMED BY INFIDELS.

An unbeliever writing to the atheist newspaper, the Investigator, earnestly vindicates Odd-Fellowship from the charge of being, in any sense, a Christian institution. How Christian men can incorporate with an order of which such a claim can be truthfully made, is a constant problem to many minds. The writer insists that, in this order, "Christianity stands on the same plane with Judaism, Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Hindooism, or any other 'ism' you can name. No belief is required in a candidate, save a belief in a Supreme Ruler of the universe? He is never questioned as to immortality, salvation, the Trinity, the Bible, the Koran, or any other 'word of God.' He may be an infidel, but not an atheist, and its doors being closed to atheism is its nearest approach to Christianity. In the funeral service not a word of the resurrection, of salvation, of Christ Jesus, or Jesus Christ, can be found. At the opening of the sessions of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, 'the Grand Chaplain shall address the Supreme Ruler of the Universe in prayer.' If the Grand Chaplain should happen to be a Christian, and especially if a Christian minister, he will probably ask something 'for Christ's sake,' but no fundamental law of the order ever requires it. Prayers are from an individual view-point, and a Mussulman would as consistently pray to the Prophet as the Christian would to Christ, nor would he hurt anybody thereby."—Christian Statesman.

IT'S NONE OF MY BUSINESS.

When men are asked to help in moral reforms, they often say, "My own business engrosses all my time." But what is our own business? Admit, for argument's sake, that we have no benevolent interest in others, yet we have a selfish interest. We are in daily intercourse with our fellow men. Their characters and habits may seriously affect our prosperity—nay, may imperil our lives. Suppose that a man begins to erect a powder factory close by your home. Are you indifferent? Do you say, "It's none of my business?" Suppose the government locates an insane asylum on the lot adjoining yours, so that your sleep is disturbed by the ravings of maniacs, will you go about your business without protest or complaint? But who would not rather have a powder factory on one side of him, and a mad-house on the other, than to have a liquor saloon on either side? A liquor saloon has all the explosive elements of the powder factory, without any of the precautions. It is a mad-house whose patients are turned out when the fit is on them, instead of being shut up. Yes, as long as rum crazes the brain, no man is safe while its victims are abroad. And he who deals out the liquor that maddens is a nuisance in any community. It is the business of every man to abate such nuisance. The law of self-preservation requires it. Prohibition is not fanaticism. It is self-protection. A few more murders will help the people to understand it.—C. E. B. in Herald and Presbyter.

QUOTATIONS FROM NECKER.

The idea of the creation of the universe is as conceivable as its eternity without being created.

The view of the universe, the workings of our minds, and the longings of our hearts all lead us to God; and though incapable of comprehending this Infinite Being, the confused sense of his grandeur and the experience of their own weakness have in all ages and countries impelled men to worship him.

Men swing from one extreme to another; from fanaticism to atheism and back, as children on a long balance rise and fall successively.

Religion, i. e., Christianity, presents us all we have need of in our miserable condition, viz, a sovereign goodness and an inexhaustable compassion.

—A ten-pin alley was destroyed in answer to prayer some time ago, according to a statement recently made in The National Union, of Montgomery, Ala. That journal, in the course of an article, says: "The first stationed Methodist minister in Troy, Ala,, was the Rev. Mr. Kelley, who had charge of the church there in 1857. There was in the town a ten-pin alley, which was a great nuisance to the religious and moral portion of the community, and the Rev. Mr. Kelley desired very much to have it abated. He was a very earnest man in prayer—so, one Sabbath morning, he prayed most fervently and devoutly that the Lord would send a wind and blow the ten-pin alley down. Wednesday afternoon following, a wind came and did blow down the house which contained the alley, and immediately ceased, doing no other damage. There has not been a ten-pin alley in the place since then. This is an actual fact, which came under the observation of the writer, and which will be verified by any of the citizens of the place who resided there then and still survive." The circumstance is regarded as very wonderful, but the rarity of such cases is due to the rarity of strong faith, which we are assured is honored by God now as in the former days (Matt. 17: 20.)

—The living Christian, pure of heart and unspotted by the world, is the best preacher of the gospel in these days. The revival that is most urgently needed is a revival of practical godliness.—T. L Cuyler.

THE PEWS TO THE PULPIT.

Not long before his death, Aug. 24, 1877, Hon. Seth M. Gates, of Warsaw, New York, presented a paper of great interest and value to the association of Congregational churches with which he was connected. The character of Mr. Gates gave force to his candid, earnest and clearly discriminating address. He had been long in public life and in Congress, and without a stain. He had seceded from the Masonic lodge, and maintained to the last a noble testimony to its unchristian character. The following portions of that address will not soon be forgotten by those who read it:

"My first suggestion as to what the pews may well expect and demand of the pulpit, is—large faith and confidence in the willingness and wish of the pews, to hear more about Jesus as the Saviour of sinners—the plain, simple gospel story of Jesus, his life and death and love, his willingness and readiness and anxiety to forgive and save; rather than the feeling that the pews demand of the pulpit, fine preaching, learned eloquent discourses, finished intellectual sermons—theological or philosophical disquisitions

The pews cannot but perceive, and be interested in, and instructed by, the fact, that just in these days, however it may have been in other days, Varley's Bible readings, Moody and Major Whittle's simple, earnest, lay preaching; Hammond's almost childish, "Come to Jesus" invitations and entreaties, and Bliss, Phillips and Sankey's spiritual gospel song-singing, attract the attention, move the hearts, and lead men by thousands to repentance, faith in Christ, and consecrated Christian living and labor—while the able, powerful, brilliant preaching of many of our greatest pulpit orators, leaves the admiring audiences that are charmed with their eloquence to go and come like a door upon its hinges—"to set before the Lord as his people; and the preacher is to them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument—for they hear the words of the Lord but they do them not!"

I infer from this brief reference to God's recent and present dealings with his ministers and churches, that the Holy Spirit crowns with marked success the earnest and faithful presentation of simple gospel truth, spoken in love mixed with faith—a faith which expects God's present presence and blessing—and I urge that the pulpit should have large and increasing confidence that the pews will be satisfied with, and demand, this kind of preaching, which looks for immediate results—regards the fields as already white and ready for the harvest; rather than erudite, elaborate, metaphysical or theological pulpit orations.

Secondly, I suggest the propriety of ministers, when out of the pulpit, acting upon the conviction that the Lord's business, religion, is really the chief concern, the most important work of every Christian; and so speaking with them day by day, in their places of business, or whereever they shall meet them, about their spiritual welfare, the interests of the church and the cause of Christ instead of taking pains to avoid and excuse religions conversation, as ministers sometimes do—making strenuous efforts to make themselves agreeable upon any and all other topics.

They might gain in the Lord's work, as well as in their own ministerial character, influence and usefulness, by much oftener breaking the ice that keeps Christians from speaking of their own souls, wants and interests, and those of the church.

There is personal labor with those who have not come to the Saviour—with the serious, those who are wounded by arrows shot from the pulpit—or are specially called and convicted by the Spirit or providence of God—almost always to be found, if carefully watched for in every congregation. Harlan Page could always find them. Rev. Mr. Spencer, the Old School Presbyterian minister, who published Pastoral Sketches, always watched for and found them; and though an able man and a powerful preacher,, the crowning success of his ministry and overwhelming interest of his book, is found in this process of following up and gleaning after his own preaching; this hand-picking of the fruit, as it is sometimes called. True, all Christians ought to co-operate with the pastor in this work; but you have set me to speak to-day particularly of the preacher's and pastor's duties, and I regard this as one of the most imperative, most delightful, and when prayerfully and faithfully performed, the most successful of them. It is a duty that cannot well be delegated to any other person. He can better do this work than any member of the church.

When a minister can keep himself humbly and vividly conscious, all the while, that he and his work, week-days and Sundays, are both wholly the Lord's, he can do this without feeling or fearing, that he is obtruding himself or unwelcome subjects upon others.

I think the spiritual portion of the pews, at least, would urge this upon the ministry as a most important duty—this personal pastoral labor and conversation with both Christians and the impenitent, instead of what modern pastoral visitation has in many places degenerated into, to-wit: an annual afternoon social family visit—a genial, jolly time, with perhaps a game of croquet—an examination of the crops, the stock, the larder, a discussion of politics, the popular magazines, the markets, the general news, a dish of tea, possibly closing the visit with a prayer, if the head of the family happens to request it, without a word of personal religious conversation with a member of the family thus pastorally visited!

Mere social visits are not pastoral visits. They may be very proper and right; but they ought never to be substituted for pastoral visits. A pastoral visit is a religious visit. Paul's efforts for the salvation of his fellow men, were not confined to sermonizing, or the stated meetings of the church. He labored from house to house, night and day, with tears.

There are persons who hold and urge that a minister out of his pulpit should put off his sanctimonious air and manner, should relax, unlimber, and remember that he is a man, should live and act as other men do, have his fun and frolic, enjoy his jest and joke, and worldly amusements; drive fast horses, or breed and own studs of them; engage in public sports, business ventures, and speculations; cultivate a muscular Christianity, repudiate and get quite clear of the "rheumatic puritanical theology and sobriety" of New England; and that for one to do all these things will not injure his ministerial character, reputation or influence; but will win him the good will and confidence of worldly men and enable him to do them good; and that it ought not to be expected or demanded of him that he spend his week-days, to any considerable extent, in distinctly ministerial labors, conversation or visitations.

Now while I do not contend that it is not quite proper for a minister to remember that he is a man, and to act and live like a man; and to mix and mingle with other men in all the ordinary reputable and exemplary social scenes of life; to laugh, and be joyful and exuberant; I do regard it as very important to his reputation and his usefulness, that he shall always, and everywhere, remember that he is a minister as well as a man; and that he shall conduct and demean himself as an exemplary. Christlike minister, a servant of God, wholly and at all times set apart and consecrated to his service; and that if he really believes the work of God and the salvation of souls as important as he represents it to be on the Sabbath, he should not seem to forget it on Monday, and act like a worldling, or talk like a king's jester the rest of the week.

Christ condescended to men of low estate, consorted often, and ate with publicans and sinners, but never, never to conform to or countenance, or wink at their worldly lives, wrong, improper or sinful conduct or practices—but always to instruct, reform, and elevate them. He so constantly ran athwart their prejudices, wrong views and practices that at one dinner party he administered as many as three pretty severe reproofs, to the very host at whose table he was reclining. He never caught and converted sinners by letting himself down to their worldly views and lives, their foolish conduct, or questionable practices, nor will any of his ministers win souls to him in that way.

One-third of a century ago it was my fortune to spend some time in a country village where there were two middle aged ministers in two of the principal churches of the place, of more than ordinary talents as preachers; and whose pulpit services were uniformly acceptably performed. They were vigorous, wide awake orthodox preachers.

On the Monday morning after my arrlva. I was surprised to find one of them sitting upon a large dry goods box in front of one of the grocery stores, whittling, surrounded by a dozen funny fellows, wits and wags, cracking jokes, telling funny and smutty stories, indulging in loud and boisterous laughter—the minister familiarly addressed by his given name and treated with just about as much respect and reverence as the clown of a circus would have been. Presently the other minister came in sight, on horseback, in his shirt-sleeves, rode back and forth through Main street, on a fast horse, looking first over one shoulder and then over the other to see how the horse carried his tail; and when he brought up he too was soon surrounded by a crowd of jockeys and jesters, who praised his horse, cracked their jokes on his speed and wind and gait, bantered him to swap horses, or try a race, both of which he was ready to do; and I soon found that this was a fair specimen of the daily walk and manner of out door life of these ministerial brethren, week after week. Coming as I had, from a parish long served by such sober, earnest godly ministers as Rev. Gilbert Crawford and Ebenezer Mead, every day and everywhere men of God. instant in their work in season and out of season, seven days in the week, and though genial and cheerful, never flippant and rowdyish, I verily thought I had fallen upon strange times and strange ministerial habits and conduct; and I think so still. Nor are the fruits and results of such frivolous ministerial carriage and conversation, or of a trafficing, money-making secularized ministry, profitable or long satisfactory, to any people in city or country. The Christian world has for months past stood amazed at the greatest scandal of the age, in connection with the name of the greatest preacher of the age; and however hopeful and confident we may be that he is innocent of the main charge brought against him, it is palpable to everybody, that indiscreet, imprudent and unwise conduct, conversation and associations, have given color and some degree of plausibility to the charge.

No minister can take to his bosom for months and months an openly and habitually profane man; who calls himself a heathen, and acts like one—make him his confident and companion, believe and declare he is the best friend he ever had on earth, and not suffer in reputation and influence for it; nor is it strange that by this and other similar careless, free and easy and ill advised associations, expressions and teachings, he should have become involved in such a labyrinth of difficulties as must greatly injure his reputation and impair his usefullness, and should be a warning to him and all other ministers in all time to come.

The true demand of the pews requires of the ministry, sober, righteous, godly living, earnest, active Christian labor, conversation, and demeanor, out of the pulpit, as well as in it—that they should be examples to the flock, as Christ was an example to them, and to all Christians.

Nor is it to be denied or overlooked that there is a prevailing tendency in many of our popular and fashionable, city and country churches, to favor and advocate a loose and easy going religion among Christians as well as among ministers, especially among young Christians. It is urged that the religion of Christ is not a sad and gloomy religion, and that it ought not to make men wear long and disfigured faces; that God wants men to enjoy themselves and be happy and that of all men Christians have most reason to be happy; that young Christians need and will have recreation and amusement, and that it is unwise to try and interdict, or prohibit them: that card playing, and whist parties, public dances and balls, billiards, bowling alleys, operas and theater going are innocent amusements, or at lsast, are no worse than something else they will compare them with,—for I notice the defence of these practices always takes this shape; they are no worse than something else—not that they are really good and useful Christian practices in themselves, calculated to promote growth in grace, Christian culture to benefit anyone in their Christian life, or to lead others to a life of piety; but they are no worse than something else, and so it is wise to tolerate them, lest young Christians betake themselves to something still worse, or become discouraged by reason of the too great strictness required of them.

Now I protest earnestly against this whole theory,—the premises and the inferences. First, as a general thing, we are not a people, old or young, of studious sedentary habits greatly in need of amusement, recreation, relaxation, from severe mental efforts and labor; but we are a working people, accustomed to manual labor and active exercise; and much more in need of rest from from physical labor, and the exercise of our mental and moral powers and faculties by reading and study, than we are of these muscular recreations and dissipating amusements above referred to,—and secondly so far as there is a legitimate demand for recreation and amusement, there are an abundance of harmless and innocent ones, that have not like these forever been regarded by the wisest and best of Christian men as in bad repute, of evil tendency, bad in their surroundings and associations, associated with unhallowed and wicked practices, loved and practiced by worldly and ungodly men, and always regarded as distinctly on the devil's territory: and it is worse than a useless task to undertake to Christianize them, and get them out of his hands and dominion. They will drag down those that attempt it, faster than they can possibly lift these things up.

This easy-going, trifling, flippant religion, full to the brim of conformity to the world—the follies of the world, the vanities of the world, the customs and fashions of the world—"all these things after which the Gentiles seek" is not the religion of Christ—is not at all after the pattern of the New Testament. In that, we find everywhere, both examples of and exhortations to, sober, righteous, godly living, self-denials, cross-bearing, Christian warfare, non-conformity to the world. We are to fight a good fight, to mortify and crucify the flesh, to come out from the world and be separate from sinners—to be a peculiar people, zealous of good works, to avoid the very appearance of evil, to delight ourselves in God, and to take pleasure in his service, and joy in the God of our salvation.

These vain and dissipating amusements, this conformity to the world—these little alluring sins that are perpetrated just over the stile in bye-path meadow, are the little foxes which destroy the tender vines of religious life, eat out the piety of the church, make barren and fruitless professors of religion, bring religion into reproach, and make men despise and coutemn it, more certainly than greater and more flagrant sins, for everybody knows that the latter are unchristian, and not justified by anybody, or any ethics.

Do you begin to ask, what has all this to do with the demands of the pews upon the pulpit?

I answer, if these things are so; if there is setting in upon our churches a strong prevalent current towards an easy-going religion—a tendency to favor and practice vain, dissipating amusements which lead away from Christ; eat out the piety of the church; bring reproach upon it, and grieve away the Spirit; the true demand of the pews upon the pulpit is, that it shall be awake to that fact—shall speak, and preach, if need be, against these things, though they seem to be little matters, and though some may be offended by it—for the watchman must warn the flock against present dangers, and present forms of worldly conformity, and departures from God—though he may find, in faithfully doing so, that the offence of the cross has not yet ceased.

N. CALLENDER, Cor. Sec.

A good story was told the other day at the Victoria Hall, London, by Dr. Ridge. who mentioned the case of a teetotal Baptist minister who was suffering from overwork. His wife, who was not an abstainer, got at the doctor beforehand, and the result was that the patient was advised to take brandy and water. After a time the patient, feeling no better, went to the doctor again. The medical man had forgotten the case, and asked the patient what he drank. "Brandy and water," was the reply. "The very worst thing in the world for you," said the doctor, who had formerly prescribed it. This will be worth bearing in mind when remedies of this class are ordered

NEW ENGLAND.

THE NEW ENGLAND BOARD of the National Christian Association has its headquarters at No. 8 Portland St., Worcester, Mass. A full supply of books and tracts constantly on hand. Orders promptly filled. Correspondence solicited.

E. D. BAILEY, N. E. Sec'y.

Miss Flagg writes: "The cause is certainly progressing. One needs only to look back but a year ago last winter when you first came to Worcester to realize what advances it has made in New England."

Geo. H. Williams writes, on receipt of the new book: "'Holden with Cords,' I think, will do a great work. It appears better as you read it in a connected story than in separate parts of a series." This is the general verdict. Bro. Williams has been in very poor health of late, being only able to ride out, without attending to business at all.

The Vermont Phœnix of May 4th contains the following marriage notice of interest to Cynosure readers:

In Brattleboro, April 30, at St. Michael's Rectory, by the Rt. Rev. W. H. A. Bissell, Bishop of Vermont, Gen. John W. Phelps to Mrs. Anna B. Davis.

Elder J. L. Barlow preached a most pointed and able sermon in reply to a printed sermon on the subject, "Beliefs that can be believed," by Mr. Free, the pastor of the Congregational church of Willimantic. The sermon by Mr. Free was a virtual disavowal of inspiration and the atonement. Elder Barlow's discourse blows away the chaff effectually and reveals the absence of any wheat. The sermon is printed.

WAYMARKS.

WORCESTER, Mass., May 14th, 1883.

Rev. G. W. Phillips, pastor of Plymouth church, Worcester, preached yesterday upon the Mormon problem, discoursing with great force and pungency upon the greatness of this evil in our land and the importance of taking measures for its suppression. He was unsparing in his denunciation of the secret oaths, with barbarous penalties, by which mainly the whole system is maintained. Those who heard the discourse pronounced it one of the ablest and most fearless sermons ever preached by Mr. Phillips. His condemnation of the oaths of the Endowment House is thought to have been to the secretists present a disagreeable potion. It is to be hoped, however, that they will not think it necessary to demand an immediate change of pastors.

In this connection it may not be improper to mention that Rev. H. A. Stimson, of the Union church, who is commonly credited with being the leader of the movement in this city against popular lotteries, preached a most able discourse on that subject recently, which is to be printed in pamphlet form. The Congregational pastors took a united stand against the lottery of the Infantry Company, and ably maintained their ground to the—next to the last, but unfortunately they weakened at the last decisive moment and showed the white feather. Their public effort, however, was not lost, it having served to quicken the public conscience on that subject. There is need enough of it.

Arrangements are completed for opening the campaign at Westerley, R. I., next week. I am under engagement to go there Saturday and commence a series of discourses in the largest hall of the city next Sunday afternoon and evening. There is a fair prospect that this movement may be attended with unusual interest.

O. C. Bailey was in the vicinity of Brattleboro when last heard from, purposing to start forthwith for Montpelier. It is now definitely settled that Gen. J. W. Phelps, Rev. W. R. Laird, Rev. D. C. Faris, and Mrs. L. R. De Wolf, will give us addresses or furnish papers. Others also will speak if there is time. For my own part, I intend to explain and discuss, at different stages of the convention, the initiation ceremonies of the Entered Apprentice and Master Mason and the initiation ceremonies of the Odd-fellows. This will be in lieu of working the degrees, enabling us to go over more ground in less time, and, it is hoped, with equal satisfaction and profit. Announcements of the convention are to be sent to the various pastors of the State so as to give the widest possible circulation to the movement. The edition of the N. E. American which was devoted to Odd-fellowship is already doing its work, and friends show an appreciation of this effort to attack this now popular and growing order. In ordering extra copies brother I. J. Gilbert writes: "It is the best thing I have seen on Odd-fellowship, and I think should be published in tract form." With a few modest blushes I venture to publish this remark of brother Gilbert in the hope that many may be stimulated to make the best possible use of the large extra edition which was printed for tract use.

2. That God requires and man needs a Sabbath.

3. That the prohibition of the importation, manufacture and sale of intoxicating drinks as a beverage is the true policy on the temperance question.

4. That the charters of all secret lodges granted by our Federal and State Legislatures should be withdrawn, and their oaths prohibited by law.

5. That the civil equality secured to all American citizens by articles 13th, 14th and 15th of our amended Constitution should be preserved inviolate.

6. That arbitration of differences with nations is the most direct and sure method of securing and perpetuating a permanent peace.

7. That to cultivate the intellect without improving the morals of men, is to make mere adepts and experts; therefore, the Bible should be associated with book of science and literature in all our educational institutions.

8. That land and other monopolies should be discouraged.

9. That the government should furnish the people with an ample and sound currency.

10. That maintenance of the public credit, protection to all loyal citizens, and justice to Indians are essential to the honor and safety of our nation.

11. And, finally, we demand for the American people the abolition of electoral colleges, and a direct vote for President and Vice-president of the United States.

COME TO THE FRONT!

Men who venerate the Fathers,
By whose skill the state was built;
Faithful to the trust they left you,
Honoring blood for freedom spilt,
Come to the front!

Men who're proof against corruption,
Whom no flattering can buy;
Scorning bribes, detesting treason,
Friends alike of low and high,
Come to the front!

Men whose loyal love of country,
Perils all things for her good;
Laying all upon her altar,
Party, honor, life and blood,
Come to the front!

Men whose love of right and justice,
Makes and executes just laws:
Laws alike for all the people,
Deaf to censure and applause,
Come to the front!

Men to shield the weak and lowly,
Who contend for freedom's plan,
For a ballot cast and counted,
As the right of every man,
Come to the front!

Men to plead for education,
Moral worth and cultured sense,
Which shall elevate the masses,
As the nation's best defense,
Come to the front!

Men who fear the Lord Almighty,
While ye scorn the despot's rod;
Men who seek the aid of heaven,
And revere the law of God,
Come to the front!

Men who know the life of nations
Righteousness alone can save;
Who confess, if this be wanting,
We shall fill a nation's grave,
Come to the front!

THE PLATFORM.

The American Freeman suggests two additional planks for the American platform. The principles they embody recommend them to every Christian voter:

"We hold, 1. That the civil service should be most thoroughly reformed—applicants for appointment being obliged to pass a rigid examination as to character and other necessary qualifications before being assigned positions of responsibility and trust, and that good behavior rather than political affiliation shall be considered for continuance in governmental employment.

2. That a law should be passed making inebriety, on the part of officials, and legislative and Congressional representatives, a disqualification for further continuance in public capacity, and the use of intoxicating beverages shall not be allowed at public banquets given by the President of the United States, except for his own individual use.

POLITICAL SIMPLICITY.

Harper's Weekly in a recent notice of Senator Edmunds says that his position was not made by patronage, and it does not depend upon a machine. His ascendency is actual, not fictitious."

Now this statement is very simple. Mr. Edmunds would probably never have been in the Senate of the United States if he had not been run in by the lodge-machine. He is a noted, emphasised partisan, and would never be anything in politics outside of his party. Though possessed of ability, his ascendeney is due to his Masonic partisanship, and depends upon Masonic fiction. He does not possess the qualities of the reformer. No man who accepts favors from the lodge could ever exercise the office of a reformer. He has remained too silent in his place when the knavish work of the lodge was being done in Congress to represent the interests of reform. He moved a restoration of one of the corruptest privileges that ever seduced the purity of men in office, viz., the franking privilege; and what is singular is, the measure failed! Even his "actual and not fictitious" ascendency, though aided by the other Senator from Vermont, failed to carry that rotten measure through.

No man who serves the lodge can be trusted with a directive part in republican government. The greatest danger to the country at the present juncture lies in lodge-politics. The country must be redeemed from that, and it is extremely absurd to suppose that men whose office and honors come from the lodge, can ever redeem the country from lodge rule.

The American party should make no compromises. We must insist upon a candidate free from every suspicion of lodge obligation. The Republic is being led to its ruin by the partisans of a dangerous, secret party, that shields criminals against all accountability in office. A man may have the tongued eloquence of an angel, yet if he aids a secret organization that renders null all accountability in office, he is helping to hasten the Republic to a rapid destruction.

Harper's publications are excellent instrumentalities for making money, but money-making and reform processes do not usually consort together very well, any more than lodge-membership and service to the Republic do. No man now in public office should be any longer sustained in that position without having his accounts properly examined into and the balauce struck. If he has ever served the lodge, or has had any connection with the lodge, the country does not owe him an office; but on the contrary he owes the people an apology. To let a man's accounts run on, placing lodge-work to his credit and not to the debit side of his account, can tend to but one conclusion, and that is disaster to the Republic.

OBITUARY.

EDSON BLANCHARD of Guilford, Vermont, died on the 3d. of May, 1883, of the heart disease, at the age of 63.

The deceased was an Anti-mason, and at one time acted as secretary of the Windham County Anti-masonic Society. His occupation was that of farmer. He was a man of strong and decided principle, believing that a Christian had no right to embrace one evil under pretence of avoiding another greater one. The idea of an Anti-mason voting for a Republican or a Democrat for the sake of avoiding the rule of either of those parties, he considered the Jesuitical doctrine of doing evil that good may come. Anti-masons he believed, should vote for Anti-masonic candidates.

MRS. LUCINDA WEST, wife of Deacon David West of Sycamore, Ill., died at her home after a prolonged, weary ing and severe illness, April 10th last. She was born in Sherburn, Chenango county, New York, Aug. 11, 1804, and was married to Mr. West in Sycamore in May, 1849, proving to him a devoted wife in the midst of the trials to which he has been subjected on account of his firm adherence to the truth as it is in Jesus, and the friendship of the Congregational church of Sycamore, of which he was a member for the Christ-rejecting secret lodges. She was a kind neighbor, ministering to the sick and poor as she had strength and opportunity. As a church member and a Christian she was well known for her charity, consisteney and fidelity. "That meek and quiet spirit which is in the sight of God of great price" was her prime characteristic. For almost half a century she had walked in loving fellowship with God and his people. Her faith in God was childlike and constant. It gave her a peaceful life and was unclouded save for a few weeks at the last, when her mind wandered under the power of disease. Her end was peace, and her reward is heaven.

The large number at her burial attest the general esteem in which she was held. All feel that a good woman has finished her course, left a noble example of gentleness and love, and gone to rest in Jesus to be met no more till we meet her in the great Rising Morn.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A MASONIC REFORMER.

Governor Butler of Massachusetts, a thirty-third, has been in power only a short time, and still he has instituted two reforms; one, the raising of sunk wrecks, a subject in which his own fortunes are apparently interested, and the other the removal of a prison-keeper and putting a follower of his own in his place. This will give the Governor an element of power which he likes to hold in terrorem over the aristocracy. What a fearful thing it would be if the Governor should let loose prison convicts and launch them upon his enemies. A Grand Sovereign Inspector General delights to let the people see and feel his power. He may not use it, but it is well to let the enemies of "the government" know what he could do if he chooses.

But where the princes of the lodge thus court favor with the criminal classes, as they are always doing, ought not the American people to be on their guard against such princes? Is it to be wondered at that states prisons should aspire to the level and the square and rise against law and authority when the sovereign princes of the lodge are made governors of States? Both the prisons of New York and Missouri, as well as those of Massachusetts, have felt the election of Governor Butler to their lowest depths. Why should not they have office too?

KITCHEN GARDNER.

PERJURY.

OLATHE, Kansas, May 13th, 1883.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—On Saturday morning, the 5th inst., our usually quiet city was thrown into a whirl of excitement by the announcement that the bank of John Harris & Co., had failed, and consequently the doors remained closed after the hour for opening. All day long a knot of anxious persons hovered about the building, speaking to each other of their losses, whilst occasionally words were uttered which reminded one of the muttering thunder which presaged a coming storm. But, thanks to the law and order principles of our citizens nothing more serious was done than the telling of what ought to be done to such a man.

By noon more attachments were issued than there was property to meet the demands. As the rule is, "First come, first served," three-fourths of the depositors can lick their chops, as did the fox in the fable whilst the stork thrust his long bill into the narrow-necked jar, and enjoyed his dinner at his leisure. Twenty thousand dollars assets and eighty thousand liabilities,—where has the sixty thousand gone? Echo answered, Where? Until such time as Madame Rumor whispered to one and then to another that the banker occasionally shuffled the paste-boards, notwithstanding he wore a Maltese cross suspended from a gold chain, and furthermore had preached from the text, "The wages of sin is death," in the M. E. church, during the great revival of last winter.

It may be that the people were paralized with rage and grief in view of their loss, and therefore the banker was allowed to enjoy his liberty for a few days. So that on Sabbath he filled an appointment in the country. We doubt very much whether his text on that occasion was the inquiry, "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Nor was it the language of Zaccheus, when he said, "If I have taken any thing from any man by false accusation, I restore him four-fold."

On Tuesday the defaulter was arrested, and after examination had before a justice of the peace, was admitted to bail. As there was a failure on the part of responsible men to respond to the call of the "widow's son," the constable was ordered by the court to hand the prisoner over to the sheriff. And wherefore was this failure to rescue a Hiramite in that distressing hour. Perhaps the Masons who had been bitten by their brother felt that they were under no obligation to succor the wrong doer who had violated the Master Mason's oath, in which he said, "Furthermore do I promise and swear, that I will not wrong this lodge, nor a brother of this degree, to the value of one cent, knowingly, myself, nor suffer it to be done by others, if in my power to prevent." As "violating any part of this solemn oath or obligation of a Master Mason" is deemed a sufficient reason to brand a man as a vile and perjured wretch, lodge men may have felt themselves absolved from the obligation, the example of following which was set them by the Good Samaritan, and therefore passed by on the other side and allowed their poor brother who had fallen among theives, to take care of himself as best he could. And then, perhaps this abandonment of the fallen was attributable to other causes, for he heard it said that the popular indignation was such as to endanger the personal safety of anyone who would take the prisoner from under arrest by going his bail. From what we have seen and heard we think prudence was the better part of valor.

We said above that the court ordered the constable to hand the prisoner over to the sheriff. Instead of doing as he was told he kept the prisoner all night in a lawyer's office, under guard, of course, on the pretext that a mob might break into the county jail and lynch the Knight Templar. Perhaps the ten dollars which the prisoner is said to have given to the officer had more to do with determining the question where the gentleman should spend the night than the supposed insecurity of the common prison. On Wednesday morning process was commenced against the constable, whereupon the prisoner was promptly handed over to the sheriff, and in due time the iron door swung too with a clang, whilst not a few of the people said, "So mote it be."

Last evening the pastor of the M. E. church, during his sermon said that some of his members felt aggrieved because he had been riding with Bro. Harris and saying that the church ought to stand by him. The pastor denied the charge of riding with the imprisoned preacher, and further said, "If Bro. Harris has appropriated one-tenth of the money which he is said to have unlawfully used, he will be turned out of the church forthwith.

Straws show in what direction the wind is blowing, and therefore we venture to guess that the lodge, at a recent meeting, say on Saturday night, decided to set Bro. Harris out on the sidewalk for repairs."

BADLY MIXED.

CHRIST OR ANTI-CHRIST, PEACE OR THE SWORD, WHICH?

WOODLAND, Cal.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Here is a copy of a notice taken from the Daily Examiner, published in San Francisco, May 2d, and among other noteworthy items from Sacramento I find the following:

"In St. Paul's Episcopal church, Thursday evening the new standard of Sacramento Commandery of Knights Templar will be consecrated with the ceremonies of the order and the rites of the church. The services will follow the usual order of evening prayer. After absolution by Bishop Wingfield, Sir Knight W. S. Cochran, of Vallejo, will deliver an address. The standard will then be formally consecrated by the Bishop."

I will not attempt to comment on this commingling of Bishop and Sir Knight, prayer meeting, priestly absolution, and banner consecrating, but simply refer to it as one of the ways in which the churches of our land are prostituting their houses of worship and their exalted and Divinely assigned position to the base purpose of pandering to an order whose principles as well as the practices of its members, are in direct conflict with the teachings of Him who is the way and the only way, the name and the only name by which men can be saved, the Rock on which the church is founded.

We had on the same day a display of a church desecration and priestly pandering in harmony with that above referred to. I attended with I suppose about the same motive as led Talmage to make his midnight round among the dance houses and dives in New York.

I heard some artistic singing, and listened to a prayer addressed to the Grand Architect of the Uuiverse and then to a labored defense of the order of Knight Templars, going back to the time of the crusades for their origin and claiming that Knight Templarism now is a perpetuation of the order then instituted, though in tracing its descent the speaker, a Rev. Sir Knight, found a chasm difficult to bridge over and admitted that there was "an uncertainty that clustered around the origin of the order in the United States." The great effort of the Rev. Knight seemed to be to make it appear that Knight Templarism was Christian. He succeeded very well in showing that the crusaders were earnest, self-sacrificing men who fought bravely for the recovery of the Holy Land and especially the holy sepulcher from the hands of the Mohammedans, and seemed very firm in his convictions that their efforts had checked the spread of Mohammedanism in Europe, and by this the world had been greatly benefited; but the connection of all this with the Templarism of the present day he did not show us. What a burlesque on the Christian name for such an association of men as usually make up a commandery of Knight Templars to assume to be the defenders of the faith. How can their expensive regalias, their gaudy trappings, their fuss and feathers be reconciled with the teachings and example of him who was meek and lowly in heart? How can their horrid oaths involving in their penalties double damnation on their souls be reconciled with the command of the Captain of our salvation who says, "Swear not at all." How strangely incongruous to listen to the clanking of swords in the churches of the "Prince of peace," who has said "My kingdom is not of this world, else would my servants fight." My soul is stirred within me in view of the blasphemous shams that are being palmed off in the name of Christianity, and I cry out with the prophet Joel, "Spare thy people, O God, and give not thy heritage to reproach that the heathen should rule over them."

The meeting referred to was held in the Baptist church in Woodland, the Knights were out in full dress, armed for war, and the speaker was the pastor of the church, a man of fair abilities, but giving plain indication that his spiritual understanding is darkened if his heart is not hardened. I intended to have noticed some of his gross and unreasonable assumptions, but as my article is already too long will name only one as a specimen of many others. It was claimed that "the Divinity or Godhead in Christ developed like his humanity!" The idea of an undeveloped divinity in Christ is certainly novel to ordinary minds, and is perhaps only clearly apprehended by those who have drunk wine from a human skull, but to the writer it seems to conflict somewhat with the scriptural idea of "Jesus Christ the same, yesterday, to-day and forever." Heaven save us from such defenders of the faith! Is this a Christian brotherhood, made up of priests and profligates, honest men and rogues, swearing men and men of prayer? Is not the mind of God with reference to all his children as connected with all such associations clearly indicated in this requirement: "And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness but rather reprove them"?

THE JEWS AND THEIR CONVERSION.

Many have been the persons who unintentionally have entered places where they have been converted. and thereby changed their aim in life. And there are many who unknowingly form certain plans and by these they are led to change their belief in life. There have been many during the past and more at the present who are hoping and praying that the "wandering Jew" may be brought to the knowledge of the truth as it is written in the New Testament, but thus far only about 20,000 are converted, of the estimated 12,000,000.

At the present much of the infidelity of the press, which in due measure has retarded the progress of Christianity, has been from the pen of Israelites who have no faith in the religion of their ancestors and who grasp for the floating fragments of popular opinion.

But we are glad to notice that many of the Jews in Germany are anxious to make a change of their Sabbath from Saturday to Sunday, and we hope that by this change many of the Jews may be induced to attend places where the gospel of Christ is preached, so that many more of them may accept of the religion which was first planted by their brethren.

Many prophesies have been fulfilled, but, as yet, the acceptance of the gospel of Christ by the Jews is, thus far unfulfilled. And as the church of Christ is becoming powerful so that it is filling the earth, may it be the prayer and labor of all Christians that these descendants of Abraham may be among the promoters of the religion of Christ, who was also a descendant of the father of the faithful.

"THE CITADEL OF FREEDOM."

If a city fights against the enemy successfully, but finds when exhausted by the contest that a foe holds the citadel and demands more terms than the defeated enemy, that city must be in a bad condition.

But Vermont, the once citadel of freedom is in that condition. Its citadel of citadels is held by the Masonic lodge. Vermont has become the citadel of Freemasonry and not of freedom. If the Republic is reckoning upon Vermont as its citadel of freedom, it is laboring under a very dangerous mistake. The State is under the domination of the lodge, a foreign institution. Its laws and its constitution are trampled upon. Back-pay grabbers and bank misdirectors represent its interests in Congress; and its religion is decaying under the spurious morality of tricksters.

If the country, after squandering its moral and national forces on the issues of an ill-settled war, looks to Vermont as its citadel, it will find the lodge there in full possession. If it has not enough force left to oust the lodge, the prospects of the Republic here are something like what they are in France, rather dubious. A republic can not be run by Jacobinism or other club organizations.

Vermont, as represented by her politicians, is a shorn Samson. She has been shorn of her strength in the lap of the lodge, and is now blindly grinding at the mill of her enemies.

VERMONTER.

DO THE FRIENDS REFUSE SOUND DOCTRINE?

GREENSBORO, Ind.

DEAR EDITOR:—I have been a reader of the Cynosure since New Years, and think it one of the best papers of its kind. There is no paper I long for so much. We have just closed an interesting meeting here. Many were converted and sanctified, and a Wesleyan church organized with good prospects for the future.

During the meeting I was invited to preach at Spiceland, and went in company with a Quaker preacher. Thoughts like these passed through my mind as I went: "If they really want salvation they will invite me to come again if I tell them the truth. If they want me to please the carnal mind, when I tell them the truth they will have no further use for me." I told them the truth, and the invitation to return was weak. When I began to speak on the evils of secret societies, one man leaning against the door (for the house was full) dodged as if he expected to be knocked down the next round. When we left the church I noticed there was a meeting called, no doubt to see what damage the craft had received.

On our way home the Quaker minister thought "I had put the fat in the fire," and to my wife mourned over my indiscretion. He took me down for a show, but the performance was spoiled by making the elephant dance contrary to expectation. This same man acknowledged that secrecy was a great evil, and said: "It is ruining our church, and I am afraid it has already gone so far we can do nothing with it." He is afraid to say one thing against the lodge. He sees the enemy coming, but will not lift up his voice and show the people their transgressions. Will not the blood of souls be required at his hands?

The first dose of Masonic carrion I ever received was at Belleville, Illinois. A whisky-drinking, beer-bloated salooon-keeper died, and the Methodist preacher, with his little white apron and God's holy word in his hand, in company with other Masons, followed the hearse through the city. This Masonic minister, on the day of the funeral, put this peace-destroyer, soul-and-body robber, through from the lodge below to the grand lodge above, and for his service received the thanks of a Masonic whisky-ring. This exhibition of Masonic idolatry opened my eyes to the evils of the lodge. The idea of ministers, called to represent Jesus on earth, associating with such men as I knew them to be—Christ-rejecting sons of Belial—was enough to turn any man with all his powers against the lodge, unless he was completely given over to the devil.

Soon after this my eyes were opened to the evil influence exerted by the lodge in the church. It was while I was stationed at West Belleville, Ill. Rev. W. B. M. Colt and myself commenced a protracted meeting at Collinsville, not far from St. Louis. Not a soul had been converted in the town for three years. The Masonic minister would go past the prayer meeting to his lodge, while a few of his members were trying to hold a prayer meeting for the good of the church. Yet this high-toned minister just suited most of the church members; but they had no use for Bro. Eaton, a man of God, who was sent to them by the conference the year before. No; they would not support him, but compelled him to resign his work for no other reason than his opposition to secret societies.

Both lodges (Masons and Odd-fellows) are about dead here. Men who were on the eve of joining have turned away in disgust. One Mason became so convicted that he was honest for a time, and said, "Masonry is no place for a Christian," and "No man can take the oaths without committing a great sin." This same man went to his brethren for advice, and the result was he denied that Masons took such oaths as I described. I appealed to a professed Anti-masonic minister who had been in the lodge, but the coward was afraid to open his mouth and speak the truth. This is one reason why we do not prosper more in our work. Such men should follow the example of Gideon's 31,700. What we need to-day is water-lappers who are not afraid to break their pitchers and let their lights shine. I want to say the fire is burning in my very bones, and God is helping me to do something against the lodge, but something more definite ought to be done in this part of the country. It is ripe for the harvest.

POINTS FROM LETTERS.

DR. JUDSON—WHO CAN ANSWER?

The fact that there are many good men who belong to the institution of Masonry is so often brought to prove that Masonry is a good institution, calls to mind something I heard in my childhood, but not having proof of its being true, I write to ask if you, or any of your many readers, can give me the facts in the case.

I more than once heard it related as a fact that Dr. Adoniram Judson was told before he sailed for India in 1812 that it was important for him to become a member of the craft now that he was to travel in the Oriental lands; and he did become a member; but that subsequently he became convinced of the evil of the institution and left them. Now who will give the facts? M. P. N.

NATIONAL DUTIES.

The words of Rev. Dr. Noble of this city, in reference to missions among our colored races, are equally applicable to other reform questions:

"It is not optional with us whether we will take these men (the colored races), who make a part of our national life, but who are low in the scale of intelligence and virtue, and lift them up; not optional in the sense that we may do it or not, and yet have all our own affairs and interests flow on undisturbed. We must do it or suffer. We must do it or see our industries thrown out of gear, our growth hindered, our power crippled, our social order put in jeopardy, and every interest and endeavor of the nation pitched to a lower key." Therefore, dear reader, let us try to rescue and preserve them from becoming the tools of the lodge, and remember that a few brave men will stand as candidates for your suffrages at the next Presidential election, to hold forth the light of your principles, which, by the divine blessing, must ultimately be crowned with success and blessings to our beloved country.

HOBBY-OBBY-OBBY.

When in conversation some time ago with a Lutheran minister, of considerable prominence among his brethren, the writer was rebuked right sharply, and reminded that it was the business of the Lutheran church to preach the gospel—not to make a hobby of practical sins. "Why," said he, "if we should undertake to particularize the church would get itself into eudless difficulty—we should have to specify against balls, theaters, tobacco, and what not. We prefer to preach the gospel and let these things be matters of conscience; with a pure gospel preached, all these things would disappear." And so no doubt Herod told John the Baptist, "Go on you and preach the gospel, and let me and my wife alone." To a pure preaching of the gospel, then, who are the enemies? Manifestly, those who want to be let alone in their sins; who want preaching that will go over their heads, and touch, if at all, the sins of other countries or other times, or perhaps even the sins of Scriptural characters, whereby, covertly, an attempt is made rather to justify sin than to condemn it.

NOTES.

"Perga." This city was at this time the capital of Pamphylia, situated on the river Cestrus, about seven miles from its mouth. This was a considerable town, surrounded by walls, and lay on the left bank of the river as they ascended it. The inhabitants were Greeks, and they had, as usual, their temples and a theatre, and a stadium. On a high eminence stood conspicuous a far-famed temple of Diana, the great goddess of the place, in whose honor was celebrated a yearly festival. Here the apostles landed, but apparently they made no stay, and did not formally commence their evangelical labors. —Lewin.

Why did John Mark return to Jerusalem? It is, however, but too easy to conjecture the mixed motives by which Mark was actuated: (1) he was young; (2) the novelty of the work had worn off; (3) its hardships, even under the favorable circumstances in Cyprus, had not been slight; (4) his mother was at Jerusalem, perhaps alone, perhaps exposed to persecution; (5) it may be, too, that the young man saw and resented the growing ascendency of Paul over his cousin Barnabas; (6) and besides all this, Mark, bred up in the very bosom of the church at Jerusalem, may have felt serious misgivings about the tendency of that liberal theology; but (7) whatever may have been the qualms of conscience which might otherwise have troubled his desertion of the sacred task, these excuses and arguments for doing so must have met with a powerful ally in the circumstances which were evidently before them. For, as Mark gazed on the mighty chain of Taurus, he remembered that they were now about to penetrate countries of shifting languages, of unsettled government, of semi-barbarous populations, of strangely-mingled worships, the brigand fastnesses.—Farrar. Matthew Henry pithily says, "Either he did not like the work, or he wanted to go and see his mother." It was no small thing for a city-bred young man to face all manner of hardships and dangers in an unknown country of barbarous peoples, infested with robbers, on an unpopular errand, and with no earthly means of defence. We must remember that "a soldier who has wavered in one battle may live to obtain a glorious victory." And Mark did gain the victory. He was ready to go on the second missionary journey. He did go with Barnabas to Cyprus. He regained, by his noble and courageous conduct, the good opinion of Paul, to whom he became a comfort and a profit (Col 4: 10; 2 Tim. 4: 11).—Peloubet.

"Antioch in Pisidia." Antioch in Pisidia must be carefully distinguished from the much greater Antioch in Syria, whence Paul and Barnabas had first started. It was built by the same great monarch, Seleucus Nicator, and named after his father, Antiochus. It lay on the slopes of Mount Taurus which the travellers must have crossed. It was built about 350 years before the visit of Paul and Barnabas. It was a city of considerable importance, and a Roman colony.

"Went into the synagogue on the Sabbath." On their entrance into the building, the four-cornered tallith was first placed like a veil over the head, or like a scarf over the shoulders. The prayers were then recited by an officer called the "angel" or "apostle" of the assembly. The sacred roll of manuscript was handed from the ark to the reader by the chazan, or "minister," and then certain portions were read according to a fixed cycle, first from the law and then from the prophets. The reader stood while thus employed, and all the congregation sat around. The manuscript was rolled up and returned to the chazan. Then followed a pause, during which strangers or learned men who had "any word of consolation" or exhortation, rose and addressed the meeting.—Howson.

"Paul's first reported sermon." (1) He reminds them of God's mercies to their nation, down to King David's time (vers. 16–22). (2) What were all Jews looking out for? For a successor to King David—one as great as he —to deliver them from the Romans and make them a great nation again. Well, says St. Paul, this expected King has come (vers, 23–26). (3) Would they say, O no! it could not be Jesus the Nazarene, for our rulers put him to death? This, says Paul, is the very reason for believing in him, for his rejection was predicted (vers. 27–29: see Isa. 53: 3). (4) But how could he reign if he were dead? Ah, that is no difficulty, for he rose again (vers. 30, 31); and this proves he is indeed Messiah, for of this also God spoke by the prophets (vers. 32–37). (5) Now come the "glad tidings" (vers. 38, 39).—Stock. (6) Then follows a warning if they refuse to give heed.

"Contradicting and blaspheming." When men, attached to sect and party, in religion or politics, have no good arguments to employ, they attempt to overwhelm their adversaries by bitter and reproachful words. Men, in the heat of strife, and in professed zeal for peculiar doctrines, more frequently utter blasphemy than they are aware. Precious and pure doctrines are often thus vilified, because we do not believe them; and the heart of the Saviour is pierced anew, and his cause bleeds by the wrath and wickedness of his professed friends.—Barnes.

"It was necessary." Not, It was proper, nor, It was our duty, but, It was necessary; because: (1) it was God's purpose and command (Rom. 1: 16; Luke 24; 47; Acts 3: 26); It was God's command, because (2) the Jews were most prepared to receive the truth, by their long training under God; (3) the proof of the Messiah and the understanding of his work would grow best upon the Jewish Scriptures; (4) they were the easiest channel by which the Gentiles could be reached; (5) this order to the Jews first, and then to the Gentiles, did not depend upon the rejection of Christ by the Jews, but would have been the more efficacious through the believing of the Jews (Rom. 11: 12).

"Judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life," i. e., pronounce the sentence upon yourselves by your actions. The words do but anticipate the self-conviction of all once enlightened but finally lost souls in the day of final judgment. They have judged themselves unworthy of everlasting life!—Butler. Observe that as every soul by its memory keeps the record of its own life (Luke 16: 25), so every soul utters its own condemnation. We are daily judging ourselves unworthy of divine grace in every act of refusal to accept and rely upon it.—Abbott.

"As many as were ordained to eternal life believed." The original word, translated ordained, signifies disposed or prepared, determined, resolved. "Such as were so disposed and prepared believed through divine grace, and embraced the gospel, in opposition to those who, by rejecting the gospel, 'judged themselves unworthy of everlasting life.'"—Peirce.

"The devout and honorable women." These women were Jewish proselytes, and for this reason are called devout (see under ver. 43). The epithet honorable applies to their rank; they were among the chief people in Pisidian Antioch. At this time many women among the Gentiles embraced Judaism. Thus, Josephus tells us that almost all the married women in Damascus were attached to the Jewish religion. These, women, having resisted the preaching of Paul and Barnabas, would as proselytes be more zealous than others for their adopted religion, and were therefore fit instruments for the enraged Jews to work upon.—Gloag.

"They shook off the dust of their feet against them." The act was one of literal obedience to our Lord's commands (see Matt. 10: 14). It was in itself, however, the language of a natural symbolism which every Jew would understand; a declaration that not the heathen, but the unbelieving and malignant Jews, were those who made the very dust on which they trod "common and unclean." —Plumptre. It was a sign that their enemies and not themselves were to blame. Arundell, who pursued the same track, remarks that it may have been literally true, for no road could be more dusty than that leading from Antioch.—Lewin.

PROMPTINGS TO FURTHER STUDY.

On what occasion did Jesus expound and exhort, after the reading of the prophet in a synagogue? What Old Testament precept can you find about the duty of the people to gather and hear the Word of God? Can you give any passage from the Gospels to show that jealousy excited the Jews against Jesus, as it did here against Paul and Barnabas? What is not worthy of those who are persecuted for righteousness' sake?

BAND OF HOPE BIBLE LESSON.—No. 7.

THE SIN OF FOLLOWING TRADITIONS.

1. A tradition is any belief or custom handed down and taught by men but which has no authority in the Word of God.

2. To follow traditions is sinful because they take the place of God's commands. They make religion a thing of mere outward show. They soothe the conscience and make people believe that they are good enough already and do not need any Saviour.

3. The Pharisees taught men that it was more sinful to violate the traditions of the elders than to break a plain command of God. For instance if a man did not wish to support his aged parents he might make a pretence of giving his property to the temple, and then by merely uttering the word, "It is Corban," i. e. a gift, they considered him released from all claims of filial duty.

4. The Roman Catholic church teaches many foolish and superstitious ceremonies which are not in the Bible, but which they say are handed down from the Apostles.

5. Many Protestants keep Christmas, Easter, and Lent. These are traditions of men, for there is no authority in God's Word for their observance. It is abundantly proved that in countries where saint's days are kept the Sabbath is always greatly desecrated. Our Puritan forefathers believed that it was wrong to keep any other day than the one God has appointed, and their principal objection to Christmas, Easter, etc., lay in the fact that keeping these days, practically annulled the fourth Commandment. The more people regarded them the less they cared to keep holy the Lord's Day.

6. The Masonic legend of Hiram Abiff is a tradition, for there is nothing about it in the Bible. If Hiram had really been murdered by these ruffians for refusing to reveal the Master's word, and then raised to life again by King Solomon, the sacred historians would not have neglected to record anything to imporant.

7. Masonry substitutes this and other lying traditions in place of the Gospel. Christ says, "Ye must be born again," but Masonry teaches men that to be initiated into its secrets is all the change they need.

8. Masonry binds its members uot to cheat each other, but gives them perfect liberty to defraud everybody else, it binds them to help brother Masons in trouble instead of doing good to all as the Bible commands. It teaches that Masonic duty requires them to conceal each other's crime; as well as many other things forbidden in the Bible.

9. Masonry mutilates the Scriptures by leaving out the name of Christ, and makes of it merely an article of lodge furniture.

10. When an Eastern prince asked Queen Victoria what made England so great a nation, the queen placed a Bible in his hand, saying, "This Book is the foundation of England's greatness." If the Bible is banished from our schools and a generation of men and women grow up ignorant of God's Word crime, and lawlessness will abound, and our nation will grow weaker instead of stronger.

PRACTICAL TRUTHS.

1. People who follow traditions are less apt to obey God.
2. Christians can follow traditions as well as the ancient Jews.
3. God's Word should be our only rule of life.
4. Obeying the Bible brings national prosperity.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Ye reject the Commandment of God that ye may keep your own tradition. Mark 7: 9.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—We should obey God rather than man.

QUESTIONS.

Introduction.—What is the subject? Golden Text? Central Truth?

4. Is there anything like it in our own day?
5. Do Protestants ever do this?

7. How does Masonry make God's Word of none effect?
8. In what other ways does it do this?
9. How does Masonry treat the Bible?
10. What is the foundation of true national prosperity?
11. What are the practical truths contained in this lesson?

LESSON NOTES.

Some Masonic Traditions compared with the Bible.

Morris says, "On no account receive a mutilated person." Mackey says, "A woman, a cripple, or a slave, or one born in slavery is disqualified for initiation." Chase says, "The colored race do not possess the necessary qualifications to be made Masons." Compare Gal. 3: 28. Col. 3: 11. Acts 17: 26.

Pierson in his traditions of Masonry says, "If we would be Masons we must yield private judgment." Compare Rom. 14: 5. Acts 17: 11.

The Master of a lodge is styled Worshipful Master. Compare Math. 23: 10.

LESSON HYMN.

"How shall the young secure their hearts
And guard their lives from sin?"

It is seriousness that wins in the end. But seriousness is neither dullness nor bitterness; it is simply the gravity that with cheerful vigor contemplates the conditions and duties of life, and that with earnestness seeks to meet and perform them.

THE CYNOSURE

of last week was worth an extra edition, and so it was printed. Commendations are abundant and, we believe, not undeserved. Our subscribers are becoming our debtors with such issues; but we shall not be exacting of them further than to ask them to be faithful to our subscription list during the summer. Don't be afraid to show your papers; they will bear comparison with any in the country. Let us have a thousand more names during '83. Extra copies of the Pomeroy number will be sent for 2 cents each in greater or less quantities. Circulate them. They will make us friends and helpers.

WE CAN COMMEND

this week to every reader the article on Odd-fellowship and the paper of Hon. Seth M. Gates. Don't read them hastily. The correspondence is good also.

NEXT WEEK

we can promise something worth the attention of every one on the Irish movement in this country.

GOOD NEWS FOR WHICH TO THANK AND PRAISE GOD—FRIENDS OF PRE-ABOLITION DAYS.

"Where storied ages o'er the memory pass,
Like shadows pictured on a sea of glass."

PHILADELPHIA, May 16, 1883.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I went last Thursday up from Washington to the home of Peter Ritner, Esq., son of the noble Governor Ritner, to get his father's biography and picture. We shall have both. I hoped to return next day for New York, but stopped and preached for Elder Ritner's pastor, Dr. Erskine, of Newville. The large and beautiful church was filled with a very intelligent congregation. Many Masons, Odd-fellows, and other members of secret societies were present. The truth "had free course, ran and was glorified." To God be the praise.

Monday I went to Harrisburgh where, forty-seven years ago I met my wife, then 17 years old. Her friends, who still live, remember her and myself with great kindness. I had two interviews with Mr. A. L. Groff, publisher of the United Brethren Itinerant. He is a young man of an excellent spirit, and in his last words, gave me his "God speed," in our work. He says the United Brethren Tribune, which I know to be a nullifaction, pro-lodge paper, was a "financial failure" (these are Mr. Groff's words); and that the Itinerant is published by a new and different company. He says the "Itinerant has not embarked on the secret society discussion, but advocates the work of the United Brethren church." Of course he will find neutrality in the secrecy discussion impossible. But "sufficient unto the day," etc. He seems to me to be a very gentlemanly, Christian young man; has a nice bookstore; and I strongly recommend correspondence with him about keeping our publications for sale.

I came down here (Philadelphia) last night, and have already seen Drs. Stevenson, of the Christian Statesman, and Collins and McDill of the Instructor, and am to meet them again. Dr. Robinson, the gentlemanly pastor of the First Presbyterian church, Harrisburgh, is in heart with us.

Yours in Christ. J. B.

DARWINISM AND CHRISTIANITY.

Darwinianism in science and the new movement in theology in New England bear some striking analogies to each other. If the scientific theory is made up without any reference to Almighty God, as the Creator of all, ignores him, counts him out of the business; so the new theology turns its back upon his revealed Word and substitutes negations and guesses for the most emphatic and striking instruction of Jesus Christ. One teaches of constant changes and modifications in nature, through which some blind force works toward superior form and character; the other manifests an Athenian restlessness for some new theory, and its demand for change has singled out the doctrine of future punishment as presenting the most repellant ideas to the human heart. Mr. Beecher, who is a great expounder of the new theories, confesses their relation to Darwinian speculation. In a late sermon in Plymouth pulpit he says: "We are at present in a transition period. Young men studying for the law, for medicine or for the arts do not care now to interlard their conversation with religious talk. That did very well for the olden times, but we know better now. We have studied Darwin and Huxley and Tyndall and Spencer. We are revolutionists. We don't believe in these things any more. There are other men who have studied evolution who believe in it, and who believe that when it shall have unfolded itself, so far from taking away anything except the masks of the theologian, and so far from any mischief coming from it, we are on the eve of a better day. Therefore I hail the incoming of new thought. Science is bringing us to-day into a realm of religious and spiritual life such as the world has never seen heretofore."

The Christian Union of New York, in which Mr. Beecher's ideas have yet a large control though he is no longer editor, has become the organ of the new theology, and it must be expected that if these ideas in religion go on developing, its columns will soon prove that God as Saviour has been cast out of its creed, as God the Creator has been out of Darwin's. It is a matter of some importance therefore to know something of the mind that developed this philosophy.

It is not generally known, we believe, what exactly were Darwin's views relative to revealed religion. True, Carlyle has denounced the whole family of the Darwins as a race of infidels, but unhappily Carlyle's frequent exaggerations have not helped his opinions into universal confidence. There is little, it is true, in Darwin's theories that does not confirm this severe estimate of him. The stream does not rise higher than the fountain. If God is cast out of the theory, there is no evidence that he was recognized in the convictions of its author; it is rather a negative proof that Christianity had found no place among them.

But there has been given a positive testimony in the case. The Boston Journal of Chemistry republishes from the lecture of Prof. Ernst Hæckel on the natural religion of Darwin, Goethe and Lamarck, made during a meeting of German scientists and physicians held last year at Eisenach, the following remarkable passage:

That Darwin also held to the same natural religion as Goethe, and that he was no adherent of any special church confession, is apparent to any one reading carefully his works. But as some of his countrypeople have, since his death, asserted the contrary, and as some clergymen have praised Darwin as an adherent to a special confession of the English church, I am able to introduce here an exceedingly valuable but hitherto unknown document which will remove every doubt that might possibly exist.

A young German student, whose faith in the Christian religion had been shaken by the perusal of Darwin's work, and who had entered the intermediate stage of doubt, wrote to Darwin, for the purpose of getting the advice of this ancient natural philosopher. At first, one of the relatives of Darwin answered by excusing the latter's ill-health, great age, and want of time, which prevented him from answering the questions put to him; but the German student was not satisfied, and so he once more wrote to Darwin, begging him to help him in his dilemma He then received the following letter, written and signed by Darwin himself:—

DOWN, June 5. 1879.

"Dear Sir,—I am very busy, an old man, and in bad health, and I cannot gain the time to perfectly answer your questions, supposing that they may be answered. Scieuce has nothing to do with Christ, excepting it so far as the habit of scientific exploration makes a man cautious in recognizing proofs. As far as concerns myself, I do not believe that there has ever taken place any revelation. But regarding a future life, everybody has to decide for himself between the contradicting uncertain probabilities.

"Wishing you future welfare, I remain, dear sir,

"Very respectfully yours,

"CHARLES DARWIN."

—Bro. Hinman returned from Nebraska last Thursday, having not yet recovered from his indisposition.

—Bro. Stoddard yet remains in Washington, but may be expected to return almost any day, since the N. C. A. building there is in good order, and the approaching annual meeting here demands his presence.

– Elder Rathbun and Bro. Butler spoke two evenings last month at Pleasant Plain, Iowa. Their work had good effect, since it provoked the lodge-yoked editor of the local paper to use severe language in his account of the meetings, and, when a reply was offered, to refuse it.
